

ANCIENT ASTRONAUTS

ANUNNAKI ORIGINS

Jon D.T.

JDT

Created by Author Jonathan David

Copyright © 2024 by False Reality Publishing

All rights reserved. No part of this book may be reproduced, stored in a retrieval system, or transmitted in any form or by any means, electronic, mechanical, photocopying, recording, or otherwise, without the prior written permission of the publisher, except for brief quotations embodied in critical reviews and certain other noncommercial uses permitted by copyright law.

A False Reality Publishing Production

Cover art and design by Jonathan David

Author: Jonathan David

Editor: Jonathan David

Audiobook Narration: Garret Kiesel

For information about permission to reproduce selections from this book, please contact:

False Reality Publishing
info@falserealitypublishing.com

David, Jonathan

Madison, WI

*Join Jonathan at YouTube.com/@authorjond for live book signings.

Ancient Astronauts

Anunnaki Origins

Audiobooks and eBooks: <https://FalseRealityPublishing.com>

Disclaimer: The characters and events portrayed in this book are fictitious. Any similarity to real persons, living or dead, is coincidental and not intended by the author.

Reality is only what we think it is....

1 | 4.5 Billion Years BCE

Just outside the edge of Earth's solar system, a large spherical vessel cuts through the fabric of space like a knitting needle slipping through a bubble. After a quick lightspeed jump, it becomes stationary, floating near Neptune. It then rotates slowly, adjusting its trajectory to align with the Sun. Once the object's course is set, the metallic ball goes from stagnant to a blurred stream shooting past Saturn, gliding across the planet's rings. The warped space trail leaves The Ringed Planet and loops around Jupiter using its gravitational pull to sling itself towards Earth. On its way to Earth, the craft maneuvers between Phaeton and Mars, sending a gravitational wave through Phaeton's surrounding space-median—the waves are left rippling in its trails. It then gains momentum, reaching speeds upward to seventy-five percent of the speed of light. Once the object reaches terminal vacuum velocity, it travels approximately 694,000,000 kilometers from Jupiter to Earth in just under half a second. It then comes to a crushing halt sending another gravitational wave across the galaxy. The vessel has arrived at its destination; destination: Earth's orbit.

The ball-shaped metallic ship's radius is 1,609 kilometers. Its configuration is nearly spherical but with a slight egg shape—a geometric feature that is only noticeable from a viewpoint outside of the galaxy. The minute oval construction is meant to accommodate the warping of spacetime so that light can bend around it. The light can then stay on a linear path as it flares across the solar system.

Once positioned, the craft maneuvers between the Earth and the Sun until the three galactic bodies become colinear. It then moves along the invisible line back and forth until it wedges itself into a perfect eclipse, casting a shadow over the Earth. The Earth all but disappears from view as the vessel finds itself in a fixed orbit with the planet approximately 386,243 kilometers away. The shadowy world is covered entirely with water—a calm blue marble stuck in the black fabric of space.

The object's slinging movement interrupts the surface tension of the untouched planet. Like a kid dropping a pebble into a pond, the gravitational waves send contour ripples 12,700 kilometers in diameter until they disappear to the other side of the planet.

In approximately 8-minutes, the temperature of the Earth's liquid surface drops dramatically. The vessel stays put until the exterior of the eclipsed portion turns into an icy shell. Once the ice forms, the ship moves rapidly in orbit to the other side of the planet. It is now eclipsed by the Earth, blocking out all sunlight except for a small glowing hoop.

After another 8-minutes, the surface returns to its average temperature, and the ice melts quickly, mixing with the warming water flowing in from the unfrozen side. The blending of the room temperature waters with the breaking sheet of ice causes massive waves and maelstroms to erupt across the globe.

The vessel continues these maneuvers for months until 70% of the water is frozen and collected in the north and south poles. The collection forms the polar ice caps, effectively lowering the sea level.

The water's draw-off then exposes a single continent of massive proportion. This freshly exposed earth is littered with flip-flopping sea creatures. As the water runs off, the animals become fixed in limp foliage bedded about assortments of rocks, sand, and crustaceans.

Within days, the former sea-dwelling creatures, struggling to breathe on the bare continent, die off. The dead carcasses and plant life leave behind a primordial genetics pool that gives birth to microscopic organisms. These organisms adapt quickly to the dry land environment and, over four billion years, blossom into super animal giants.

2 | Earth's Satellite

After the virgin continent was exposed and the polar caps formed, the vessel became dormant, permanently positioning itself into a spinless orbit such that one hemisphere faces the Earth and the other faces the outside galaxy.

The moon-sized spacecraft has intentionally become Earth's satellite, permitting the ocean tides and twelve lunar cycles. The vessel will remain motionless on its continuous loops about the planet for hundreds of millions of years. Its stable position plays a vital role in the prevention of external disasters.

Unlike naturally formed bodies of mass, the gravitational pull created by the moon is of a nonuniform nature and can be manipulated. When necessary, it will increase and or decrease its gravity in various places of its surrounding median. These modifications send out tiny spurts of gravitational waves. The waves generated then warp the fabric of spacetime about an unwelcome object, pushing it off course. This change of course prevents contact with the surface of Earth and other nearby planets.

The enormous spacecraft satellite is constructed of a material that can absorb massive shockwaves equivalent to thousands of nuclear bombs. When something such as an asteroid impacts the surface, the position on the surface will take on its shape and then bounce it back out into space. The outward projection is usually made up of small chunks that are no threat to the Earth. Once projected away, the surface assumes its standard spherical shape.

Along with the protective features of the Moon, it has also been purposely placed in a nonrotational orbit.

The ship keeps from spinning by using interlocking, spherical gyroscopes that turn with astronomical rates. These speeds counteract its angular momentum, which keeps it from revolving. Once positioned, it can then shut them off and remain in a spinless orbit. This allows for a particular instrument to be guaranteed total sun exposure during an eclipse.

For the Sun to eclipse the Moon perfectly while aligned with the Earth is a seemingly impossible alignment as the diameter of the large gassy ball is four hundred times that of the Moon. The universal odds of two celestial bodies eclipsing to be seen from a planet's surface naturally is essentially one per Big Bang.

This eclipse and the nonrotation of the Moon allow it to keep a specific area exposed for the purpose of recharging its inner workings.

3 | Evolution

It has been billions of years since the Earth's underwater continent was exposed by its new Moon, igniting the beginning of land life. On this new land formation, species of air-breathing creatures spawned. They quickly mutated and evolved into larger and larger entities.

The single continent has become overwhelmed with skyscraper reaching monsters. Their massive size and equally massive appetites have become problematic to the vast landmass. They consume all available resources so rapidly that they are forced into cannibalism, leaving the former plot of green land a putrid surface. The filth then begins to leak into the surrounding ocean, causing pollution, and the contaminants kill off precious water life.

This event triggers the Earth's harmonic vibrations with the surrounding galaxy, and after billions of years, the dormant Moon starts to vibrate, smoothing out its crater-encompassed surface.

Over the years, the artificial Moon collected mountains of space debris. The collection of various meteorite fragments and dust particles grew the crafts radius to 1,728 kilometers, concealing its smooth surface. External impacts and reshaping of the ship's shell leave a ring of dust. The result then looks like a flat crater, particularly over time as more space dust covers the recently exposed ship. The accumulations and collisions left it soiled-grey and littered with craters. The space vessel's exterior now looks like just another dead outpost of the Milky Way Galaxy. That is until it awoke after billions of years to begin its second terraforming of Earth.

At the time, abruptly, the vibrations of the vessel create what appears to be an earthquake splitting the surface. A crack then stretches across the visible exterior and outward towards the dark side of the Moon, making a gap so large it can be seen from the surface of Earth. As the external breach thickens, a line in the sand is drawn, sending space debris tumbling inward like two parallel waterfalls.

Along the line, dust and meteorite fragments fall into what appears to be nothingness—similar to a black hole. It then becomes clear that there are doors buried deep under the surface, which had been covered by various materials over the years.

The doors pull away from each other, and an opening fifty kilometers in diameter appears. The hatch looks like a circular elevator buried in the desert. Some material falling inward makes dead clinks in the void of space. The gap continues to grow until the doors are fully withdrawn, and a massive tunnel with no end appears.

From the nadirs of the tunnel, a flash of brilliant light pops from nothingness. It appears out of thin air as if a hidden camera snapped a photo at the center of a cylindrical black hole.

Following the bright light, empty space crackles and then splits vertically along the base of the dark tube. Through the seam, a sizeable and jagged asteroid forty-eight kilometers wide emerges, separating the curtains of space. Once the giant rock is fully exposed and the splice seals up behind it, it hovers inside the tunnel equidistant from all walls.

The faux Moon then sits in a frozen state until the Earth has rotated, and the center of the dryland faces it. Once aligned, the surface begins vibrating again, forcing the crater-filled land to shake into a smoother surface. The asteroid then discharges out of the tunnel shooting towards Earth with a crushing speed of one hundred kilometers per second. It takes the rock just over an hour to reach the planet. As it rips through the atmosphere, the object cracks and erupts with blazing flames, which generate billowing pillars of smoke that can be seen from the thermosphere to the crash site.

Just before impact, the giant mass sends a shockwave dispersing in all directions across the landmass. The wave knocks over enormous dinosaurs and overgrown mammals, instantly killing off small animals and insects. As the creatures fall and die, the asteroid crashes directly into the continent, carving out what will become the Pensacola of Florida and Mexico. Once sunken deep into the Earth, the impact force sends lightning-shaped fractures throughout the large island, splitting it into segments forming the seven continents of the modern Earth.

Following the life-slaughtering earthquakes, the base of each landmass detaches from the seabed. This separation causes an elastic collision flinging the individual portions of land across the ocean, dividing the seven seas. A parting that results in a catastrophic event, executing nearly all dryland life. The division of the smaller landforms leaves each piece in a different ecosystem, which eliminates the threat of large over-consuming animals from evolving again.

Before the icecaps were formed by the artificial satellite and water encompassed the planet, the only volcanic opening had been at the base of the submerged body of land. This volcano single handily generated the enormous undersea-island. When the asteroid crashed into it, the collision severed the volcanic tube from its base. This severance sets off a torrent of lava, releasing pressure from the planet's core, triggering unanticipated volcanic eruptions across the seabed. The widespread flowing lava then turns the planet into a celestial whirlpool of death. These molting discharges and uninhabitable surfaces leave the Earth a desolate reservoir of smoke and ashes lasting over one hundred thousand years.

Once the underwater volcanos cool and seal themselves up, the bacteria that survive the boiling bath begin to evolve. Their evolution will again leave the aquatic life to be the sole survivors of Earth for millions of years to come. This enduring water life keeps itself tucked deep in the ocean right near the core of the planet. They mutate into more advanced bacteria by consuming each other, starting the foundations of what will become the next generations of life. While forming, they use the energy emanating through the agglutinate to extract sun-like sources of energies they cannot get at the surface due to the blacked-out sky.

Eventually, the atmosphere begins to clear, filtering out the smoke and ash-filled clouds. The rays of the Sun then start to shine, piercing the icy land shields. The intense beams of light cause frozen water pockets to thaw and release suspended bacteria into the drylands. These microscopic organisms replicate quickly and evolve. They eventually develop into vegetation and hermaphroditic animals, which then continue to change, soon leading them to find other similar species to breed with.

Simultaneously, some developed water entities instinctively use their preexisting genetics from the first dryland days to escape their liquid prison. The untouched soil of dryland then becomes swarmed by evolving aquatic life. They intertwine with the current life, which eventually forms the premodern ecosystem.

After another sixty to seventy million years pass, the Earth finds a balance of suitably sized life and evenly distributed resources. The reformed blue dot has become dappled with various islands of different colors and environments untouched by the human virus. It is the most beautiful and resource-rich planetary body in the solar system.

Following the Earth's harmonizing, the orbiting Moon is alerted by the planet's natural frequencies. These frequencies originate from a shield encasing the atmosphere of Earth. The protection is made up of quantum particles produced by the in-sync life on the planet. It intentionally keeps out dangerous energies generated by intergalactic surfs of radioactive waves.

A natural event had taken place upon evolution: Once the planet had an evenly dispersed amount of life, the collection of biological material kept electrons jumping continuously about the globe. And the massive movements of charged particles generate a subatomic-magnetic flow. The electrons jump from atom to atom – cell to cell – body to body, and the friction creates an opposing force. The forces made by the particles movements push away from and towards all other particles. The Earth also makes a similar force that repels the electron friction, just as two magnets repel each other. Because there is little to no life in the atmosphere, the force cannot be contained, so it becomes normal to the surface protruding outward. It then accumulates at all points on the planet, beaming subatomic fields of particles up to the thermosphere where the vacuum of space contains it, and the protective shield is generated. Before the field was generated, the intergalactic waves were needed to create the protein strands that make up the bacteria; the shocks they produced were essential to the birth of microscopic organisms. But once they evolved, the solar energies became deadly, forcing life to fight back, eventually creating the forcefield. The artificial moon had been programmed to pick up these frequencies, which then reawakened its consciousness.

4 | Seeding

In the year 100,000 BCE, the moon made its first and only rotation since it arrived at the sun's third celestial body 4.5 billion years ago. In the blink of an eye, it flips 180 degrees such that the former front-facing hatch is moved to the new dark side of the moon. Upon the twisting of its body, the surface debris floats up practically weightless in the unoxygenated atmosphere. The materials then gracefully settle back into an evenly distributed terrain.

A few Earth days pass before anything happens with the alien-moon-craft. It then shoots out of a small opening, what looks like a torpedo close to the length of the Willis Tower—nearing four hundred and forty meters long. This 42-kilometer door, on the new lit side of the moon, will eventually become known as the Aristarchus crater—the brightest of all the visible craters.

The long tube-like vessel departs slowly, positioning itself into a connecting orbit with the moon. It waits patiently, making many revolutions. The surface of the craft is as shiny as a freshly polished katana. Earth's brilliant colors reflect upon its smooth shell, flickering like a mirror spinning in front of a flashlight. It continues to turn and loop about the Moon until the Earth is appropriately aligned for the most efficient trip to the surface.

Once directed along its oncoming path, the vessel begins puffing out what looks like tiny cloudbursts of steam from thousands of different discharge points along the surface. Each little air ejector moves independently of the other, angling itself away from the Earth to create force directing the vessel towards the Planet.

The ship moves out of orbit, leaving the dust-covered metallic moon to slip deeper into the vacuum of space behind it. The vessel must move with elegance on its voyage so as not to disturb the inner workings.

The inside of the object is as equally circular as the outside. The craft has a cylindrical cutout that extends from one end to the other with a round pointed tip, looking similar to a modern-day rocket. Its continuous spin creates a source of artificial gravity. One could walk along the equator of the ship's belly for eternity without reaching an end.

Within the tubular craft resides a colony of humanoid avatars. They are each isolated within oblong-shaped containers. Their feet are stuck to the circular wall, and their heads point towards the ship's center. The bodies are not securely attached to the walls, so the ship's movements make them sway and wobble. The effect looks like the tentacles of an inverted sea cucumber.

Each of the Earth-designed body's is infused with tranoquarts—technology from the core of their home planet. This material helps protect them from dangerous waves and vacuum pressures they may encounter in deep space travel. It also provides the necessary technology for their sole purpose on Earth.

Before the craft continues towards the life-dwelling planet, it stabilizes itself to prevent any damage to the payload. As it remains stationed with a slight drift, another ship pops out of the Aristarchus crater. This spacecraft is no bigger than a modern U.S. shuttle. It carries a crew of two pilots and five passengers. Its composition consists of a foreign metal that mimics the surrounding median turning it invisible as it exits the crater. The pilots must wear specialized suits. They need them for the potentially hazardous environments they will be exposed to on the Earth's surface. A simple gust of clean oxygen could be deadly to them.

After the craft exits the crater, the doors begin to close back up. By the time the doors lock shut, the piloted ship had floated miles away from it. The invisible vessel then blasts off, leaving nothing in sight other than a waft of moon dust blown from the surface, re-exposing a small portion of the Moon's original shiny shell.

It only takes a fraction of a second for the ship to find itself entering Earth's orbital radius. The pilots hadn't any confusion about their destination. They align the ship appropriately and float in orbit, zipping around the planet a multitude of times as they wait for their shipment of lifeless bodies to arrive.

It takes just over a month for the cargo to near Earth. As it does, the invisible craft leaves orbit to escort it gently into the atmosphere, ensuring that it does not ignite into flames as it taps the stratosphere.

Once between the stratosphere and the troposphere, a different type of fuel ejects from the engines. The force generated is of magnitudes more powerful than the puffs of cold air previously released. All the tiny engines turn again, angling themselves at the surface of Earth. Their purpose is to oppose the gravitational force sucking them in. This way, they can glide gently through the unknown atmospheres and land without damaging the planet or the vessel. It takes a few hours for the enormous craft to make its way to the surface. As it slips through each outer atmospheric layer, the invisible ship stays close to monitor and ensure its gentle landing.

Before the object makes touchdown with the surface, it splits into four individual ships, three uniform cylindrical shapes—descending in size, and one smaller craft containing a cockpit. They slowly float through the air until the largest pod lands approximately 29.98 degrees North, 31.13 degrees East. The others follow, creating an alignment with Orion's Belt—Earthly coordinates that will become the epicenter of humanity.

The cylindrical ships come to the surface, hovering just above a grassy green meadow. They slide around like pucks on an air hockey table, moving to their programmed coordinates. Once aligned, they come to rest on the surface, and their bases sink deep into the soft soil, concealing nearly a third of the vessel's exterior. The invisible ship follows their landings, extending out its unseen docking gear, pressing into the virgin green grass. The green blades flatten to the ground where the feet of the ship touch, creating large square imprints. The impressions remain present under the invisible craft as if a rectangular footed sasquatch left footprints on its way across the land.

After some time passes, a door opens, extending a staircase outward to the surface. It looks as if the opening of the door is floating within nothingness, hovering in the clear blue sky. The alien astronauts then begin to exit the vessel. Their spacesuits look like deep-sea diving gear made from solid steel. However, the material is lighter than goose down. They bounce up and down slightly as they descend to the surface—the same way a 20th-century astronaut would on the Moon.

Once their feet hit the grass, their suits auto-adjust to the gravitational pull, and they become stuck as if on their home planet. They then walk near the three cylindrical ships. One of the crew members takes out what looks like a synthetic Ram's Horn. The individual then holds it up towards the settled crafts, and it begins to generate loud bellowing noises. The soundwaves alter the fabric of the three surfaces, and they start shaking. The material then separates from itself. It shifts from connected to being made of small metallic-like marbles. Then the tiny balls divide into even smaller round shapes. They continue to diminish in size until finally, they melt away to the ground, creating three ponds of mercury-like substances. The pools of liquid alien metal then resolidify, forming into uniform square platforms.

The colonies of avatars remain at the center of each platform, floating in the air like circular towers of invisible coffins. The largest of the colony's skins are colored dark brown. The other two colonies are divided into brownish beige colors and light-skinned. The skin tones are specifically designed to accommodate specific ecosystems around the planet.

The scientists walk up to the floating bodies of lifeless flesh to analyze them. They fly up and navigate about the pillars of inanimate humanoids, using flight technology built into their suits. They check every one of them for defects or damage, examining thousands. It takes days for them to complete the task. They must ensure they are undamaged before they send them to their designated locations. The void humanoids are intended to act as hosts to the consciousnesses of their people. So, they mustn't make a mistake. Else, one's resonance could be lost in the transmission.

After passing inspection, all but a small group of the bodies float up and away from the shiny platforms. They have a built-in antigravity mechanism along with a propulsion system that takes them to their destinations. Once they reach their positions on Earth, the casings will become active, signaling the home planet, and the transfer can begin.

As the colonies move out of sight, the scientists begin working on the platforms left behind, preparing them for construction. The three platforms are meant to serve as foundations for monstrous triangular towers. These towers will eventually become known as the Giza Pyramid Complex of Egypt—the true epicenter of humanity. All three of the monumental structures will serve a specific purpose in colonizing the Earth.

After some essential preparation was performed at the landing site, the scientist, again, uses the magic horn to reopen a platform—the one destined for the Great Pyramid. The platform separates from the center out, exposing the base of the cylindrical ship, which is still dug deep into the ground. They hollow out any earth within and then fly their invisible craft inside, sealing it up behind them. They then board the tip of the vessel—which had previously separated from the cylinders—and return to Earth's orbit.

Once in orbit, they travel at sixty-nine percent of the speed of light for three months relative to Earth, looping around the planet continuously. When they return from their near lightspeed travel, they have aged three months, and the Earth has aged approximately ten thousand years, putting them around 90,000 BCE.

5 | Return

As the crew finishes their last revolution about the earth, their ship breaks free from extreme speeds, creating a universally insignificant gravity-wave. The halting spacecraft then generates a reverse sonic boom as it comes to a stop—relative to the planet's spin. The deceleration from the near-light speed velocity to zero causes a clap of thunder to rain through the clouds, sending echoes across the globe. A roar so powerful no creature is shielded from it. While the air carries the soundwaves along the surface, the alien spacecraft follows in after.

Within a few moments, the ship is nearing its original departing position. For them, it has only been three months since they left. Even though they understand the laws of relativistic physics, they are still amazed when they lay their eyes upon three glimmering pyramids and a surrounding city flush with green bush and meadows.

The smallest of the pyramids, the Pyramid of Menkaure, is covered in bronze material. The second-largest, the Pyramid of Khafre, is coated with a sort of copper-like surface. The Great Pyramid of Khufu is the largest, wholly laced with pure gold and a titanium alloy tip, polished to a perfect mirror reflection. For the smaller two, the metals may seem to be of the copper and bronze nature. But they are actually a derivative of gold mixed with their home planets transient-nano-metal. The material that forms the base of the structures.

Surrounding the monoliths, within a fair distance, are plots of lands for farming, small villages, and everything else needed to support a large community of people. The seven scientists look to each other with satisfaction as it appears that their mission was a complete success.

The ship comes down from the clouds, leaving a trailing jet stream that stretches and weaves throughout the sky, looking like a snake slithering through fluffy rocks. It maneuvers about the sky and heads straight to the pyramidal structures. The craft itself looks like the pyramids; only the edges are smooth. It comes down gently and rests along with them, appearing as if it were the offspring of the preexisting buildings.

Nearby the three massive pyramids is a much smaller mound of bricks built up similar but with a flat surface. The crew immediately knew that this was designed for them to land on. The sides of the structures are meant to act as the airstair for their vessel. When they come to rest, the ship completes the triangular ensemble. The flat surfaced mound now mimics the largest of the three pyramids in cosmetics with its shiny spacecraft ship for a tip.

After, they remain within the craft for some time, examining the outer world they had spent thousands of years planning. It is awe and inspiring to them.

Before gearing up, they scan the planet for traces of their hybrid people. The nonhybrids are more or less immortal as long as they are confined to their home planet's core material; however, the lifespan of the organic versions left on Earth is unknown.

The team grows eager to have their consciousness transferred upon arrival. Their resonance that makes up their current lifeform is contained within an artificial body they had to build to survive. This was something they had to do on their home planet of Nibiru. A world drifting further and further away from the Sun, where the last of their civilization, the Anunnaki, still reside, imprisoned within the earth.

As the group continues scanning the planet, they seem to have no luck locating their hybrid relatives. Each body had been fixed with a quantum tracking beacon that communicates via entangled particles—instantaneously. But they are only finding faint traces of a single tracker, and its scans do not seem normal. It sends back data as if it is in another time or dimension. The group assumes it must be a faulty residue of quantum tunneling.

They then scan further, searching for traces of their home planet's core material, material that should be present in all of the living peoples of the earth, but they find nothing. It is as if the planet is vacant like an interstellar ghost town.

They all agree to get ready and leave the sanctuary of their vessel; the only place on Earth they can survive without wearing a suit. They can, however, live without issue while residing within it. They can do this for as long as they need because their transoceanic bodies do not require substance. The suits provide them with their home planet's core energy, which is as essential to their life as air and water are to Humankind.

Once they go through all the checkpoints making sure each of their outfits is working correctly, they open the doors to their vessel and prepare to take the first steps on their new home planet. They stand at the doors anxiously awaiting what they will find. When the doors open, to their dismay, thousands of people are gathered about the landing platform kneeling and praising them as if they are gods.

6 | Mission- Colonize

After the transfer of resonance of the select few from the Anunnaki's home planet into the avatars, their mission was to breed and start various civilizations across the globe. When the lifeless bodies shot off three months ago to the crew and ten thousand years ago to them, they were clustered in groups enough to have a mixture of bloodlines across the breeding sequence. They would continue growing while constructing pyramids to create a network—amongst other necessary structures.

The significant constructions were to be placed on and along magnetic hotspots of ley lines. These structures would then allow for electricity to be harvested. They also have many other purposes, such as generating quantum fields to protect them from external threats.

The pyramids are also designed to work in sync. This allows them to send identical frequency beams of quantum molecules to the outer layer of the troposphere. They then fuse together to form a spherical shell. This forcefield can then protect the planet from external threats. The same system can also act as a weapon to blast off unwanted asteroids or other undesired objects. A must-have secondary defense against unknown threats in case Earth cannot defend itself. The protection is essential as the blue sphere is quite delicate and requires much care to maintain livable conditions. It is also a prized planet that other races may be seeking to colonize.

There were roughly two thousand Anunnaki hybrids sent to Earth. Their bodies were constructed from genetic material harvested from Earth thousands of years ago when Nibiru last passed through the habitable zone. The hybrids were each divided and sent in small collections to various locations where geographical hotspots occur. The most important place was the great pyramids, a position on earth that acts as the center of a compassing map. The other locations have similar properties but without the directional significance of where the Great Pyramid of Giza is located.

When the pods and the bodies they held landed at their destinations, the Anunnaki from their home planet received an alert. The selected then were able to permanently transfer their consciousness into the hybrid bodies billions of miles away.

When they first opened their eyes and saw the blue skies and green grass amongst other nature, tears immediately began flowing. They felt emotions they hadn't known since they were organic, tens of thousands of years ago, before transitioning into inorganic beings.

At first, the feelings were overwhelming, like taking a new drug for the first time, but they quickly overcame the sensations and adapted. One thing they had forgotten to anticipate was hunger, as they hadn't eaten food since they first transitioned their resonances into the artificial bodies on their home planet.

After months of experiencing and enjoying life again, the various groups set out to begin building a new civilization. Each pod had been fitted with the necessary tools for monolithic construction. An ideal living environment that holds up over time while withstanding the weather. It also doesn't require any complex mining or chemical processes to produce like steel does.

A leading fuel source for their hybrid bodies is gold; the tranoquarts they are bonded with require this metal for survival. While the organic portion involves food, water, and oxygen, the inorganic requires ionized gold.

As the hybrid-Anunnaki dive further into their mission, traveling about, they were unexpectedly approached by native people of Earth. They are in absolute shock when they see the humans coming to them.

All over the planet, native peoples seek out the hybrid-Anunnaki after witnessing the great snake in the sky. The cylindrical vessels jet streams can be seen from all viewpoints of Earth's surface. The color of the fuel the cylindrical ship had, turned green when mixing with the oxygen. The greenish jet stream looked similar to a snake that stretched across the horizon. This sight eventually spawns religions and myths of the sky people who rode snakes from heaven.

The natives instantly realize these people are extraordinary, and the concept of God and gods becomes a new reality, prompting the people to document what will eventually fill the pages of the bible. They worship the extraterrestrials without question. At first, they feared them, but the Anunnaki invited them in without creating anxiety. The way one may put their hand to a dog's nose to sniff before petting it.

The hybrids stand ten feet tall, and at the time, humans had only evolved to be four to five feet tall, making them giants in comparison. The humans walked up to them, carefully touching them as if they may be a burner that one doesn't know is hot or cold. They examine their skin, which appears to change in the sun's reflection, giving them a similar skin tone to a Rainbow Scarab. The iridescent colors would eventually become the origins of the worship of dung beetles by Egyptians.

For thousands of years, the hybrid-Anunnaki lived within the societies of these ancient people, teaching them and helping them as they went on their own mission to continue forming Earth into their desired arrangement.

When the Anunnaki first examined Earth, they found massive amounts of pocketed gold reservoirs that they assumed would be easy to mine; however, amid their terraforming, a move that altered the state of the planet from the state they originally studied caused the gold to be distributed about and buried deep within challenging to reach places. Even with their advanced technology, they could only extract a few ounces each year. They were also trying to build pyramidal structures globally, but it was becoming too tedious. Since there were so few of them and their breeding attempts hadn't panned out, they could only move one stone at a time or have one hybrid-Anunnaki mine at-a-time. This became problematic as they hadn't a clue how long their organic bodies would last. They needed to have the technologically advanced society up and running to build more bodies so the rest of their race could transfer their resonances. But more importantly, so they could have backup bodies for themselves.

Due to this unforeseen circumstance, they all decided that despite their fondness for the earthlings, the people of Earth must become their slaves and mine the gold, and build the monoliths for them.

It wasn't a difficult transition for the hybrids to go from visitors to pampered gods.

At 100,000 BCE, the ancient humans were enslaved and forced to build the technological society for the hybrid-Anunnaki. These hybrids then fell in love with themselves, self-proclaiming their holiness as gods to the people. They soon learned that they could effectively breed with the humans despite their failed attempts to reproduce with each other. A new era of kings and queens entered the uncivilized people of Earth, creating bliss for few and misery for many.

7 | The First Moon

4.5 billion years ago, when Earth was just a floating blue ball, it whipped around the Sun with a sister planet, opposing its trail. The two spheres of massive proportion would zip past each other on each revolution, never coming in contact. Each of their orbits was shifted slightly from being uniform with the sun like two overlapping circles. This neighboring planet to Earth would eventually become known as Planet Theia.

Theia was a very unique and special planet. Its path about the center of the solar system went against all logic in the local galaxy. It orbited the Sun in a clockwise direction, unlike everything else moving counterclockwise. It was also like Earth because it was mostly hydrogen and oxygen. However, it was free from water in any form, and surface life was not present.

The atmosphere was predominantly made up of hydrogen—a miniature sun weighting to ignite. Its core consisted of magnesium, an element abundant in Earth's crust and seawater. The rare combination of pure element accumulations made the planet act more like a balloon in the wind than a body stuck in the quicksand of gravity.

Theia was not externally inhabitable but offered all the elements necessary and nested comfortably within the habitable zone. It was only a matter of time before it would have become teeming with life—that is, until it met its inevitable doom.

Theia and Earth, like two siblings, fought for their mother's attention—their mother, the Sun. They circled and twirled about the gassy center of the solar system since their formation, attempting to knock the other out of orbit with each flyby. The two planets grasped at all passing objects, sucking them in with their gravity to enhance their size. The increase in mass offered a more significant pull of gravity. Combined with the rotational motion and elliptical trajectories, the larger of the two would have the advantage of pushing the other out of orbit.

If one took the two planets and sped up their evolution over billions of years to a thirty-minute show, it would look as if they were conscious and well aware of the other's presence within their orbit—a celestial conflict for the primary use of the Sun.

The ballet between the two continued until their sizes could no longer keep them from grazing the other when passing by. They inched closer and closer on their almost uniform trajectories about the Sun for millennia, only in opposite directions. Once the two bodies gained enough mass so that they were of the approximate size, the grouping pushed gravity into a balance. They both then shifted slightly out of their overlapping trajectory into the same course. This happened when each was on the opposite side of the Sun relative to the other. Their new path aligned them on an almost circular route, with a uniform radius about the Sun.

There had been another planet—planet Nibiru—caught in the motion of the two orbiting bodies. The clockwise and counterclockwise movement of Earth and Theia kicked Nibiru back and forth on a semi orbit of the Sun. This action kept it within the habitable zone on a permanent sunny holiday. It would have been as if the United States reversed rotation in November, sending it back to June. Then in June, it would get kicked around, sending it to November. This back-and-forth semi orbit was broken when the two bodies balanced out, sending Nibiru on a new trajectory stretched across all the planets.

The final equating mass was a classic iron asteroid about the size of Rhode Island. It flew past Earth—just missing it—headed towards the Sun.

When it approached the Sun, the extreme heat expanded it, melting out any noniron contaminants. The chemical reactions then flung it off its direct-hit course with the gas ball. When it reentered the vacuum of space, the freezing temperatures forced the molting ball of metal into a nearly perfect sphere—an island-sized cannonball destined for Theia.

The smooth iron ball reached Theia within days, slipping right through the troposphere into the hydrogen-encompassed surface. The massive collection of hydrogen invites the subzero metal in without disruption. Unlike an oxygen-filled atmosphere chafing an object into flames, a hydrogen-filled atmosphere nurtures it like a child jumping into a hamper of warm, freshly cleaned sheets.

The absorption of the massive metal bead was what tipped the planet into equilibrium with the Earth; it was the yank that stretched the spring, breaking the gravitational coefficient between the bodies. The alterations locked the two on the same orbital path. The new positions gave them approximately 180-days to enjoy a lone orbit before the inevitable clash of singularity occurs.

Just shy of a half a year later, the two planets neared the other. All the other planets in the solar system felt the oncoming doom resonate through the median of spacetime. It is as if they all stopped their orbiting paths—if only for an instant. They then sat back to enjoy the show, observing the beautiful catastrophe about to occur.

On day 178, the facing surface materials of Earth and Theia began pushing back to the opposite ends of the planets like blowing air on a spoonful of thick soup. The extreme increase in gravity brought on by the planets closing in on the other, ripped the atmospheres open, uniformly separating the gases that previously shelled the worlds.

On day 179, the friction from Theia's separating atmosphere rubbing against outer space caused the separated hydrogen collection to ignite, bursting into a brilliant blue flame as if it were a celestial Bunsen burner. The force pushing the atmosphere to the opposite end of the planet makes Theia look like a spherical rocket with a translucent cobalt flame. This unforeseen reaction sends Theia accelerating out of its head on trajectory with Earth.

On day 180, the fiery blue flames disappeared, leaving behind the first liquid surface Theia had ever known. The intensity of the outer layer of burning hydrogen caused the lower layer to fuse with the oxygen surface of Theia, generating a clear blue exterior free of any life and contaminants. The entire planet looked like the beachfront of a Caribbean Island. For a brief moment in history, two crystal blue planets circled the Sun.

On day 181, Earth and Theia met their destined collision. Because Theia had been knocked out of orbit, it was on a rogue path headed outward or possibly into a new alignment further away from the Sun. But it was too late; the two planets had come too close to miss the inevitable obliteration.

Earth had the Sun on its side, helping it remain in its orbit. Theia then came closer and closer until about 70% of its mass struck Earth's spinning body. Oceans slapped together like two sumo wrestlers slick with oil. The connection generated such friction that lightning bolts spread out in all directions. The crooked beams of light crawled across each planet's surfaces, crackling so loud that the soundwaves carried particles into space, allowing the sound to be taken to other worlds. Not a single object in the solar system went untouched by this impact.

The water from the two planets then mixed together, creating mega waves half the size of the Earth. Theia had been shaken from stability, so the majority of its surface melts into Earth's. Following the collision—for a few minutes—all of Earth's aquatic life resided within a standing wave the shape of a steep bowl. The waves then shot to the back of Earth, pulling water back, exposing the barren seabed.

Theia had only just formed water the day prior, so the base of its liquid surface was still the metallic color of its magnesium core. There had been a layer of various elements protecting the inner body until the force blew it back. The magnesium core then moved into the Earth's crust as it sideswiped the planet. Fractures broke in the seabed of Earth, exposing its molting lava core, oozing out an array of liquidized alloys that separate and settle into gold, silver, and other precious elements.

Shortly after the collision, the waves sent to the opposite end of the planet make their way back around after meeting themselves. While the water traveled the globe, the core of Theia wedged itself within the Earth's earth like shooting a pinball into a thick piece of clay, leaving it half lodged on the surface.

The magnesium core of Theia sat for an instant pivoted in the calmness of the storm. This element keeps its atomic form until it mixes with water, which causes a reaction so powerful that it separates the hydrogen from the H₂O—igniting simultaneously. When the massive floods of water began pouring in, they caught fire. It looked like blue versions of black lava rolling across the land, inflaming everything it encounters.

As the first droplets of water touch the metal, spurts of hydrogen begin flinging off, quickly catching fire. Then more water drowns the metal, putting it out for a moment. Once the reaction restarts, a blast equivalent to thousands of atomic bombs blows Theia's core to pieces.

The force sent a fourth of its mass outward, creating a belt of debris that orbits the Earth. Along with the scattering of the core, pools of water plopped into space, quickly forming into building-sized icicles that flew outward like a fleet of warships preparing for battle. The bulk of them headed towards Nibiru, ripping through its atmosphere. The collection of pointy objects then plunged themselves deep into the crust the way an angry porcupine would to a patch of smooth threatening skin. The ice littered the planet's surface with everything it needs to form life on its next orbit into the habitable zone.

The two bodies eventually came to a calm, fusing into a new Earth. At the same time, the externally blasted chunks collected like scattered magnets in its orbit. Within a few million years, the Earth reformed its liquid surface, surrounding a large patch of land where the collision occurred. Then, tides began flowing in and out—momentum caused by Earth's brand-new moon built from the wreckage of the crash.

8 | Nibiru

Planet Nibiru is the only planet in the solar system that does not orbit in a wedged position between the other worlds. The planet's orbit, like all planets, is elliptical in nature. However, the invisible line it travels along is so extended that the circular trail from one end to the other appears parallel at a distance. On average, one Nibiru year is equal to 7,500 Earth years. 2,500 of those years are spent within close proximity to Earth. It then leaves and takes around 5,000 years to return to the habitable zone, leaving the planet stuck in a blackout region of space.

While Nibiru is within the habitable zone, the Earth comes close to it at least 2,000 times while making its standard orbits.

Nibiru's path is slowed drastically when it enters back into the Goldilocks Zone. The Sun's gravitational pull with the other nearby bodies causes it to become nearly stagnant as it floats about the Sun. A location it once knew well before Theia, and the Earth's collision forced it on its new trajectory.

At 4.5 billion years BCE, an artificial moon was sent back in time, preventing the collisions of Theia and the Earth. The architects had been unaware of the presence of the planet before their launch of the Moon. When the fake moon arrived, it sent an unexpected gravitational wave across the solar system, which kicked Theia off its orbit. This wave also affected another planet, Planet Phaeton. Phaeton had a unique orbit unbounded by the sun, a trajectory that was still about the Sun but nonuniform. The gravitational wave that came through knocked it out of its position, wedged between Mars and Jupiter. This separation caused a second gravitational wave to shoot across the solar system, repositioning the elongated orbit of Nibiru.

When Theia was knocked out of its path to collide with Earth, the artificial moon used gravity wave pulses to guide it into the Sun.

The two planets would have made contact, and it would have been the crushing display of fiery lava, spewing chunks of the planets every which way. But the artificial interference prevented this from happening—an act that would cost the planet Nibiru its place within the galaxy.

The newly found Moon repositioned Earth to a more uniform orbit, and Theia went tumbling into the sun. When Theia hit the sun, it rolled into it one quadrant at a time, melting into nothingness. A spectacular sight to watch an entire planet evaporate one piece at a time as it spins into a massive ball of fiery gas. This action had an irreparable effect on the orbit of Nibiru. Since the separation of Phaeton, Mar's, and Jupiter's locked triplet orbit about the Sun was broken. The natural formation of the solar system had to adjust all planets into new alignments. Nibiru was then sent on a scattered trajectory—something the Anunnaki did not anticipate in their calculations—something that wouldn't be detectable until the future.

At that time, the Sun was a changing T-Tauri star. The impact of Theia and the Sun sped up an already set-in motion process. It set forth the transition from a T-Tauri to the Yellow Dwarf we see today, permanently altering a solar system that once existed on another string of time.

9 | The Anunnaki

The last time any of the Nibiru natives—The Anunnaki—saw Earth was when it was still a single landmass touted with giant feathery lizards. This was around 115,000 BCE when they were still a relatively primitive race of humanoids.

The Anunnaki spent 2,000 years near the Sun before realizing that they would be exiting the preferred distance from the star. They hadn't any knowledge of the last elongated orbit. It is unknown to them if they evolved on Nibiru or were placed there by an external intelligence. They simply never had any reason to pursue such knowledge. The perfect environment provided the race with an ideal lifestyle, not knowing what natural death is. Hence, advancements in science weren't necessary for survival.

They spent most of their original 2,500-year paradise orbit close to the Sun, a fruitful life. They never felt temperatures below 70 degrees or above 90. Their home was a single continent always pointed to the Sun. They advanced slowly, not needing technology to survive due to the abundance of resources and lack of predators. An essentially vegan race, peaceful and caring. The planet did not have much animal life other than small critters not worth the trouble. The lack of hunting left them a nonaggressive race, never knowing war or disagreement—just love and caring for everyone—a true Garden of Eden. It wasn't until they tasted the fruits of technology that their minds became tainted.

After learning of their soon-to-be dark and frozen destination, they all began studying science, moving away from their Hawaiian lifestyles of peace and tranquility. They learned quickly that the time they had left was vital to prepare themselves for the oncoming winter of space.

The Planet Nibiru is the Opposite of Earth when it comes to land and water ratio, so the people made the best decision they could with the science they developed and decided to hollow out the inner workings of Nibiru and relocate underground. They spent their time carving and gathering soil and plants. They studied the structures of cave workings so they could maintain airflow throughout as well as to keep smoke from fires moving through the caves and chimneys. It was pretty ingenious work for such a primitive culture. The tunnels went thousands of feet underground. They built gardens and learned about electricity so they could have artificial light to keep them growing. They essentially made a duplicate surface ecosystem on a much smaller scale within the planet.

On their final days, as they felt the temperature drop below seventy for the first time, they gazed upon the giant blue ball of rippling liquid as they left the Sun. They had always fantasized about Earth every time it passed them. It would come so close; it may have been mistaken for a moon that looked like a crystal ball in the sky. They all fantasized about making it their home. Still, they had only recently discovered electricity and hadn't the push to even consider something like space travel. They never had a motivation to do anything other than eat, celebrate life, and make love. The idea of jumping planets was a fantasy for them.

At the time, they were unaware that their planet would soon be orbiting hundreds of millions of miles away from the Sun. They observed the Earth and how it spends half its life in warmth and the other in the cold; they assumed it would be the same for them. Unfortunately, for the Anunnaki, planet Nibiru does not have a similar orbit. When it leaves its slow trajectory, the Sun's gravitational pull shoots it off, amplifying its speed. It then rockets along its super stretched orbit for many thousands of years.

Despite the Anunnaki people being thousands of years old, they never thought to study the stars or advance in science. They had always had the perfect climate. For at least a thousand years, they were convinced their planet didn't move. It wasn't until one of the people noticed the shadows changing that they became aware of the planet's movement.

When coming around the Sun, Nibiru came so close to Earth that the Anunnaki could see the single landmass littered with massive animals. They then watched the blue planet become smaller and smaller as they became colder and colder, so they retreated to the inner workings of their underground cave environment.

Regrettably, for the Anunnaki, their calculations of orbiting planets were way off. They began to drift further and further into space. They took a few periodic peeks from the surface to see where they were heading. When opening, coming to the surface, the last thing one of them saw was a few planets like Mars and Jupiter. The sun was a fraction of the size they remember. It was becoming a sizeable twinkling star.

Before they ultimately settled into their underground world, one of the Anunnaki went up into the hatch they built to the surface to see if they had started moving back towards the Sun. Within a few seconds, the nearby people heard a partial scream and a thump. The person had fallen back to the bottom opening of the hatch. When they opened it, the top hatch had dropped shut, and the person fell out onto the ground, breaking into two pieces. The body had frozen solid instantaneously. The Anunnaki then fully realized they were in for a long hall.

10 | Evolving

For thousands of years, the Anunnaki adapted to underground living. Their completely encased lifestyle brought upon the need to evolve. Early on in their long orbit, they began changing—gearing away from the peaceful life they tried so desperately to cling onto.

When the Anunnaki discovered they would be orbiting outside of the goldilocks zone – for a long time – they had no idea it would be in the thousands of years. They never kept a calendar. When they finally began measuring time, they just called the measurement a splice. A splice is a similar length of time to the Earth's second. The only planets they really knew of, were Earth, Venus, and Mercury. They assumed they had a similar orbit to the other worlds before they left the habitable zone. So, they made an estimate based on the trajectories they remembered, thinking they would spend 2,500 years on one side of the sun and 2,500 on the other side of the sun.

The first few hundred years underground were not too dissimilar to their above-ground life until the wells began to run dry, and the crops started to disappear. They had to resort to eating animals, something they were not fond of. So they figured they simply needed to make the cave system bigger and deeper to support the original people and their offspring and their future offspring's offspring.

As they went on, their understanding of science grew, and it grew exponentially. Within fifty Earth years, they went from a primitive people just discovering electricity to a race as advanced as Earth's 21st-century cultures. They dug deeper into their unexplored planet, finding new minerals, metals, and other substances unknown to them. The materials allowed for them to continue advancing, making life more sustainable as they grew further. Life was good and getting better and better. Soon they forgot that they had once lived in paradise, fully adapting to their subterranean lifestyles.

For some reason, none of the Anunnaki seemed to die of natural causes, on the surface or below the surface. They had never known old age—just a final stage of development after birth. A primary reason why their population snowballed after they evolved on their planet. The overgrowth was becoming a problem after a few thousand years, so they kept hollowing out their earth and hollowing it out, tossing debris out hatches they had built. They constructed spacesuits that allow them to roam the planet's surface, which gave them the ability to reinforce the shell of their new hollowed-out home.

Upon reaching the core, they learned of its uniqueness, discovering a way to provide themselves with an endless energy source. They would study this core for many-many years. The core lay directly centered within the planet—a shiny round object. By the time they exposed it, they had all become repositioned to the inner surface of their empty spherical world. Where their feet once stood on the surface, a mirror image reflects beneath where they stand now. The core then acted as a sort of sun, but it didn't emit light—it just sat there floating equidistant from all points as if it was anchored in spacetime.

Eventually, the inevitable occurred, and they depleted all-natural resources. As intelligent as they are, it is just not possible to keep an endless supply of organic substances. And with an ever-growing population, even with, essentially, unlimited amounts of energy, the balance of resources tips to the nonorganic. The situation posed a massive problem for their survival. They needed to find a way to fuel their bodies without biological substances.

About halfway through their elongated orbit, some of the top Anunnaki scientists found a way to transition from the organic body into an inorganic body.

Within the core of Nibiru is an abundance of transient nano quantum particles. These particles shift from the quantum state to the molecular state forming various metallic atoms in-between each transition. This unique material is simultaneously in a primordial ooze state and solid state, giving it the physical appearance of room temperature mercury that doesn't move. However, it is anything but a liquid metal and has properties that allow for magical things.

The scientists studied the tranoquarticles for thousands of years, learning that it becomes stable when the substance is intertwined with a life force. The life force can manipulate the material into whatever it so chooses. And since the metal operates quantumly, it does not need physical nourishment, gaining all its energy from perpetual transitions between the quantum state and the nonquantum state.

The Anunnaki were able to successfully relocate their life forces, from their inorganic bodies to the tranoquart bodies they invented using the core of Nibiru. There was just enough material to transition all of the willing Anunnaki. The unwilling eventually died off as the core depleted. This left them unable to breed. They anticipated this, so they preserved enough biological genetics and reproductive material to create more Anunnaki if or when needed.

11 | Return to Goldilocks

It had been thousands of years since any of the people of Nibiru left the inside of their planet. One day, scientists decided they wanted to learn more about the surrounding worlds in hopes of finding resources to return to their biological bodies. When they opened one of the hatches to the surface and went above, they immediately recognized their location. They had forgotten that they would eventually come back to the Sun. They didn't even know Nibiru had turned around and was on a path back home. When they made this discovery, they returned to explain to everyone that they could soon return to the surface once more without wearing a suit.

At 110,000 BCE, 5,000 years after they left their close orbit of the sun, Nibiru returned to the habitable zone. The colony rejoiced with mild enthusiasm if only to know they could possibly return to an organic state and breed again. They knew their surface was nothing but a metal ball covering the mountains of rock they piled on it, so they would need to planet jump if they want to go back to their former or at least a similar lifestyle.

They had big plans to relocate to the beautiful blue planet that never leaves goldilocks. They knew they would come in close contact with Earth, so they built some ships to fly to it and explore whether they could live on it or adapt to its atmosphere. A small group boarded one of their first-ever space vessels, a vessel they used much of the little resources they had left to build.

The ship they made was created to mimic their inner atmospheres to live within it without wearing their suits while on Earth.

When they arrived and landed at an unknown destination, the eldest and leader of all the Anunnaki, Adamah, took the first steps of any Anunnaki on another planet. When his foot hit the ground, and the door closed behind him, the essence of his body's energy source began vibrating uncontrollably. He froze up, and within minutes, he split from the quantum entanglements with the tranoquartiles.

The sight was that of a metallic body being excited from within. The casing of the suit began fracturing, generating jagged cracks. The cracks started leaking, seeping out pools of glowing blood made of light. The photons that made up the luminous blood didn't move outside of the collection of the escaping lifeline. The photons act as a single group of particles, each with absolute zero velocity.

Adamah stood frozen as if he were a hot piece of iron dunked in cold water. His resonance electrified. The pools of liquid glowing light shake and vibrate until the inside particles break into nothingness. His outer casing—just an empty metal shell—now the color of Gold—drops to the ground making a soundless thump.

A few of the Anunnaki watched what was happening as they began to leave the ship. They also started to feel their resonance alter. Even in their protective suits, when the Sun and Earth's atmosphere lined their bodies, the outer-surface gas particles and UV rays initiated the anti-resonating effect. Without warning, the few Anunnaki at the door pushed the others back and shut it, never to see Adamah again.

They would learn later that the absence of their planet's core killed Adamah. The ship they built had been constructed with materials from the core—energy-providing materials. Their inorganic bodies need to be encompassed by this substance in order to survive. Something they learned the hard way.

This daunting realization left the Anunnaki stranded underground. They quickly learned that they could not coincide with their tranoquant bodies outside of the layer between the core of Nibiru and its outer shell. The enclosure had created a type of quantum permittivity between their tranoquanticles and the void space.

A sudden overpowering sensation of claustrophobia spread through the Anunnaki like a contagious virus. They realized they would be trapped for eternity in this hollow sphere if they didn't figure out how to escape.

They had a limited amount of years to try and separate their resonances from the tranoquanticles. However, the quantum entanglement of the life force within the quantum and nonquantum states is unbreakable without vast energy resources, resources they have available in their core but couldn't use without killing themselves. This left them in a conundrum as they couldn't leave the shell to find these materials—they are trapped.

Overtime, Anunnaki scientists figured out how to make a special spacesuit that would sustain them on Earth. The suit was not too dissimilar to that of a deep-sea diver.

Once they were able to leave the surface, they began exploring Earth. They sent out expeditions and probes to examine the living conditions. At this time, it was not a suitable environment for intelligent life and will require much adjusting. The planet was amassd with a single patch of desolate land intertwined with enormous islands of floating ice and lethal animals. The Moon was no spherical beauty; it was mostly ice and various surface materials from the former Earth collision with Theia. After their exploration was complete, they understood that the planet was uninhabitable in its current state. This was when the Anunnaki's leading physicists Abaddon and Yeshua devised a plan to send a vessel back in time to replace the faulty Moon and prevent the growth of undesired animals. They would re-terraform Earth in the past so to prepare for their future relocation.

Their team calculated everything down to the nanosplice. They did the research to learn how and when the moon was formed and what the previous Earth had been like. Their study showed it would be a planet completely covered with water, not exposing any land. Their understanding of planetary motion told them how to use the moon to re-create the ground in a fashion such that it is a more pristine living condition for humanoid life.

While they orbited within close proximity to Earth, they used all their time to mine the planet of organic flesh and gold along with other valuable materials. They then used the materials to construct their organic avatars and inanimate bodies to transfer their consciousness into. Gold was a key ingredient as it is one of the critical atoms generated by the fluctuation from the quantum realm into the nonquantum state. The gold allowed them to build organic bodies that contain the tranoquarts in the blood—an essential building block required for them to permanently leave their current encasings.

They were only able to create a few thousand earthling-ready bodies with the material from Earth. After, they began building the moon, and they understood that this would take many hundreds of years. So, they created it to be the moon for their planet, something Nibiru was always without. This way, they could keep it in orbit about Nibiru as they continued construction on the long journey outward of the currently understood solar system.

The transferred team's mission was to breed and grow into a society advanced enough to create more avatars. They would need to have this culture ready when Nibiru returned to a near orbit with Earth. To transmit the resonance from a Nibiru body to an organic Earthly body, they needed to construct a structure powerful enough to beam a subatomic field to Nibiru. One of the many purposes of the Great Pyramid of Giza.

The first set of avatars were built with a quantum joining to the genetics of the chosen ones. This connection did not require anything other than the flip of a switch to transfer their resonances—the new bodies would need something more practical to make the change.

They eventually launched the wormhole time-travel mission, which allowed them to instantly transfer their team of scientists from the tiny moon on Nibiru to the new moon of Earth. They could see, from the quantum entangled cameras, the new Earth and its glorious beauty. All the continents and the streams of clouds that washed it like a fogging pool of water brought back memories they had long forgotten. A sense of peace and comfort came over them they hadn't known for thousands of years.

At 100,000 BCE, they sent a small team from Nibiru's moon to the Earth's moon along with the avatars that lay in a frozen state, ready to begin the seeding process. The Moon's inner workings were built to mimic Nibiru, so the Anunnaki could live within without their exterior suits. The remaining Anunnaki would have to wait patiently for the artificial bodies they created to breed and build the technology needed to transfer the remaining Anunnaki resonances.

Abaddon, Yeshua, and their team departed the moon. The avatars would follow once they made sure the planet was safe. When they arrived, they learned that their experiment had a detrimental effect on Nibiru's orbit. The alteration they made to the solar system by sending Theia into the Sun and positioning their false moon caused Nibiru to be kicked out of orbit. The planets had to realign to function correctly, and Nibiru's portion of the Sun's attention wouldn't permit it. It is as if the Solar System fired Nibiru for insubordination.

Even with the time-entangled moons, transferring their consciousness into the avatars is impossible without being near Earth. The wormhole between the moons only permits a small group to travel each trip. They also needed specialized spacecraft built using the core of Nibiru. This left the remaining Anunnaki on a path outward into unknown space. The news put a new mission in order, a mission to find a way to transfer their consciousness from the home planet to Earth without being nearby.

12 | The Faux Moon

It all started with a single particle—a sub-subatomic particle extracted from a twin-tranoquart. This tiny molecule has an exceptional property: the uniqueness of quantum-time entanglement when split. Like cutting a telepathic Earthworm in half, it proliferates into two versions of itself while remaining consciously connected.

These twin atoms are not usually found in the Milky Way Galaxy. However, they do float in on occasion. Usually tucked deep inside asteroids made primarily of decaying twinned particles. Thus, they are not difficult to detect, only difficult to find. Fortunately for the Anunnaki, their planet's core didn't originate from the local galaxy.

To reach the entangled particle, the Anunnaki scientists first took a twinned particle and separated the nuclei. Once they split the single, double nucleus Atom into two, the electrons dispersed, leaving nothing but the hearts. They then used massive force from the planet's core to knock out the entangled particles—one in each nucleus. They then trapped them within a transient casing made of the tranoquarticles. The only way to contain such a particle is within a material also made of subatomic material. Each particle then became the building foundations for the two moons. One was destined for Earth 4.5 billion years ago and the other to continue orbiting Nibiru.

It wasn't difficult to find the material needed to construct the moons. Their new path had taken them far out into the solar system.

On their travels, first floating past Jupiter, they mined its moons for super compressed metals. To their surprise, the compounds formed on Jupiter's moons were not too dissimilar to their core. This allowed them to create a synthetic version of their home planet core to act as the outer shell of the new moons.

They spent a few decades within the grasps of the gassy planet, then they shot off to Saturn, where they found forms of energy that allowed them to power the massive moon structures.

On Saturn's moon Titan, the surface is plagued by a crawling current. The current walks the sandy dunes like a wiggling spider web made of lightning, stretching across the surface. The friction from the nitrogen windstorms flowing across the magnetized exterior builds up dunes of semi-liquid energy sources. These mounds seem to defy the laws of physics as they pile into what looks like a snowdrift only opposing the wind.

This unique material acts as the primary energy source of the internal battery of the moons. Once they collected enough, they then needed to find a way to build such an enormous vessel. Making it from scratch wasn't a feasible concept, so they sought the solar system for potential moons they could use. First, they considered hollowing out a moon, but the time and effort would be too great. Also, breaking a large moon from its positioned orbit was impossible with the resources they had.

After scouring the nearest planets, they came across a small dwarf planet they hadn't even known had been there—the planet of Pluto. Orbiting Pluto was seven moons at the time. Two of them were small enough to use their planet's gravity to snatch them up as they passed by. So, they fixed Nibiru with an engine that could slow it down or speed it up to line up with Pluto's orbiting position. Then they could pop out of its orbit, if only for a minute, like plucking a rubber band sending it right back to its original position. This action would shoot it close enough to Pluto so that its gravity would overpower Pluto's and kick the two smaller moons into Nibiru's orbit.

Stealing the moons was easier than they had thought—a great success for them when they reached Pluto. They just slung their planet in shifted gravity, and the smallest of the seven moons slipped into Nibiru's orbit. They then set out further away from the Sun, becoming the new furthest planet from it. On their very long journey, they built the small moons larger and outward, using them as the core of each new moon with the twinned particles as their cores. Within the heart of the bodies, they planted the entangled particles. They then used the wormholes naturally formed by the particles, to act as the main gate to past Earth. These naturally formed stones are essential for interstellar travel as their molecular structures are inherently independent of spacetime.

The two moons soon came to fruition, and they sent one out on its mission to Earth to seed their new world.

13 | 4.5 Billion Years BCE

Stuck within Jupiter and Mars's gravitational pull, the orbiting planet Phaeton is reaching an inevitable end to its fruitful rain.

Phaeton has been orbiting just outside of the habitable zone within Orion's spur of the Milky Way since the solar system formed. Usually, a planet could not support surface life more intricate than a microscopic organism at this distance from the sun. However, the massive amounts of energy Jupiter produces, combined with the sun's light waves, creates a unique atmosphere for the planet. This atmosphere has sustained intelligent life for billions of years.

The surface of planet Phaeton maintains a steady temperature of 22-degrees Celsius at all geographical locations outside of the north and south poles. This even temperature results from a constant spin while staying within Jupiter's grasp. Jupiter keeps Phaeton within close proximity while Mars prevents it from sliding into the gassy ball. Mars's trips around the Sun then reinitiate Phaeton's spin on each round. The movement of Mars acts like the force of a hand slapping a basketball on the tip of one's finger to keep it in uniform rotational motion. The combination of forces allows Phaeton to piggyback Jupiter about the Sun while staying within the protection of the giant planet's warping of spacetime.

Phaetons even spin, and near moon orbit to Jupiter allows for steady temperatures along the surface, just as a whole chicken on a rotisserie would while rotating over a fire. At first glance, the planet appears to be a moon of Jupiter, but it does not orbit Jupiter; it is stuck in place orbiting the Sun with Jupiter.

The distant Sun helps to illuminate the land, the energy from Jupiter provides an endless paradise amidst the drylands.

Phaeton's minute amount of sunlight helps to produce a visible spectrum. This spectrum is generated when the Sun amplifies the radioactive waves of Jupiter, creating a rich glow. The nuclear energies combine with the surrounding plant life energy to form a vivid emerald-green atmosphere with a hazed orange troposphere.

The formed light then allows for animals to have various types of vision.

Since the planet was fashioned from the local stardust and locked within Jupiter's gravitational pull, it didn't take long for life to evolve. The conditions were immediately perfect, and the consistent smashing of asteroids into Jupiter spewed off all sorts of strange and foreign life forms that floated in from galaxies far-far away.

These odd life forms hitchhiked on different materials that helped Jupiter become the gas giant it is today. Jupiter wasn't always gaseous; it was once a solid sphere of mixed metallics. An intermingling only possible under the extreme pressures of planetary creation.

At first, penetrating objects simply broke to pieces upon collision with the planet. Then, a moon-sized comet with a core of frozen acid cracked Jupiter like an egg. The two bodies blended together, leading the impacting object to become the yolk of Jupiter. The heat from the friction melted the acid, which in turn melted the assortment of metals and the chemical reactions began expelling various forms of gas. The gasses kept coming and coming – for hundreds of years – until finally, the planet formed into the ball of freely floating molecules it now is.

Along with the many collisions, expelled debris formed all of Jupiter's moons. During this formation, Phaeton was on its own orbit, zigzagging between the preformed Mars and Jupiter. It zipped about the sun crossing Mars's path, feeding into Jupiter's then back across Mars's.

Once Jupiter became fully formed, as well as Mars, one of Phaeton's passes got warped. As it headed out on its trajectory, it was slung backward like the aftereffects of a slingshot. The planet then bobbed back and forth until it settled within the grips of Jupiter.

Shortly after being placed in an immobile orbit, Mars swung by, creating a ripple in space that initiated Phaeton's uniform spin.

14 | The Life of Phaeton

Within a few million years, the first aquatic life more advanced than a space-traveling bacteria evolved. Many of the lifeforms are quite strange-looking but beautiful. They emit multiple colors the human eye is incapable of seeing. Also, the emitted light waves are outside the color spectrum visible to nonnative life, making them appear invisible to anyone peaking in.

Not long after, the fish-like entities and other sea-dwelling life—not within Earth's species—began to develop. There are no mammals, nor are there reptiles or amphibians, or any other familiar species. Just strange radioactive thriving creatures that lived in harmony with the others. The lifeforms of the planet's true origins do not stem from the Milky Way. One may look at the surface through a telescope and see a barren wasteland. Another may alter the lens and see utopia.

The animals continued to evolve and interbreed, producing more and more advanced species. After an unknown amount of time passed, the lifeforms became self-aware. The growing intelligence then evolved into a humanoid-like form, quickly becoming the dominant species of the planet. They called themselves Helios.

Some of the species of Phaeton had dual entangled particles allowing them to exist simultaneously in different locations on the planet. Others were made of synthetic materials giving them computer-like capabilities. Some had formed from a metallic type of material made up of atoms that do not fit the periodic table of elements known to Man. These atoms consist of two and sometimes three or more nuclei'. They are like a female's egg containing two sperm destined for twins.

As some of the animals grow, so do the nuclei of each of their individual atoms. They then split off, duplicating themselves. The atoms multiply the same way cells regenerate. They do this by extracting subatomic particles from the surrounding spacetime median. At the same time, they simultaneously feed on organic and inorganic matter.

There would be entire schools of the exact same creature right down to the individual molecules. Helios called them Quantum Twinlights or Quanights for short. It was a great delicacy of theirs as well as a staple since they would consistently duplicate, providing a stable food source. They had to be careful not to eat the entangled ones unless they could find their entangled counterpart. Otherwise, the consumption of a twinned-entangled-particle would temporarily fuse them with the still-living creature, and the result is strange. They would become warped into an alternate species or vibrate in time—a painful and unpleasant experience sort of like dropping interdimensional acid.

The Quanights have a similar structure to an eel combined with multiple squids—a tubelike form with skirts of tentacles evenly spaced out. Their skin emanates a rainbow of colors on the nonvisible side of the spectrum.

The animals' atoms would duplicate, and then a third, fifth, or any set of odd number tentacle collections would form. When they generate an odd set of squid-like arm collections, the mid-group splits like an earthworm cut in two. Then, they would divide into two perfectly symmetrical equals and continue regenerating. The number of suction-cupped arms they separate at told of which breed the Quanights belongs to.

Another delicacy of theirs was what may be considered a plant; the lifeform was inverted in spacetime. It was not easy to harvest because the Helios also had to switch into an inverted state to find them. Their preparation was an even trickier task. Once they pulled the roots from their cross-dimensional inversion, they began moving through spacetime in all directions like a spilt cup of time traveling milk. They had to be disassembled while they were being de-rooted to prevent this. The process was similar to how sushi is made from a pufferfish having to be skinned and filleted alive. The technique prevents the poison from excreting into the meat upon death.

Eventually, the Helios evolved beyond the need for food or any organically grown substance. The consumption of all the different multigalactic creatures turned them into a super race far more advanced and intelligent than any living entity within the known universes. Their abilities became God-like—only, their powers were restrained within the realm of the universe they reside in.

15 | Helios

The Helios had been living on the planet for millions of years, continuously evolving. Their technological advancements were so far beyond that of any other race that they would've appeared to be mystical beings or gods if met by different forms of intelligent life. Even the highest of the evolved and technologically advanced wouldn't have been able to comprehend their abilities—no matter how much they think they know about science and the mechanics of the universe.

The Helios were beautiful hominoid-like people with deep, dark, red-colored skin standing 10-feet tall, on average. Their bodies were completely hairless and naturally muscular with a perfect tone. They had a human-like configuration but no eyes, ears, mouths, noses, waste, or reproductive systems. Instead, they resembled faceless red manikins that grew from roots in the forest half-buried underground. They didn't always look this way, though: the surrounding environment took them from a bare prime ape to the advanced plant-like entity they became.

Throughout the evolution of the Helios race, their physical bodies adapted to the planet's unique source of light. Instead of finding biological substances for fuel, their bodies modified and began using the surrounding radioactive light energy rays. Their skin began absorbing these unique beams of energy, and the Helios's cells then converted them into mass. Over time, they became less and less hungry until they completely adapted and no longer needed molecular substances. Eventually, the orifices on their bodies closed up as they no longer had use for them—except for their reproductive systems. Which stuck with them for some time until these organs, too, dissipated.

It was not an entirely natural evolution—that is, their technology for converting mass into energy and energy into mass was integrated into their bodies. They learned how to use the natural rhythms of their own life forces to power the devices, which allowed them to live without the constant need to consume other sources of life. Over time the technology became one with their biological structure and DNA. After thousands of years passed, children began being born with the technology already inside them, eliminating the need to surgically combine it with the organic body. Then, some quarter million years later, their bodies began evolving into a single quantum entangled unit that turns energy into mass.

The senses of the Helios evolved and fused with the fabric of space, allowing them to communicate through quantum tunnels embedded within the cellular structure of their skin. They didn't need to see or hear or physically touch anything because the quantum-fusing with spacetime gave them the all-seeing-eye throughout the universe.

After a few hundred thousand more years, the Helios evolved into entities perfectly adapted to their planet. Unfortunately, at the peak of their evolution, the loss of their reproductive organs led to the inability to further the race. As a result, many of the first entangled Helios became unified with a greater universe – outward of relative spacetime – disappearing from existence. They achieved the rainbow-light-body religious monks attain from intense meditation, altering their bodies from the solid-state into pure light.

The remaining Helios eventually became so interwoven with Phaeton's earth and the fabric of space that they grew into the quantum-median of the planet and metamorphosized with the spacetime their bodies resided in. This unification left them physically immobile but able to spiritually roam the universe. What was once Helios's legs turned into a fleshy organic system of roots. The root system helped them absorb energy from the core of the planet. At the same time, their torsos sucked in the radiation from Jupiter. One wouldn't know they were alive if they saw them; they would think they are some sort of plant that coincidentally looks like a person.

Once the remaining Helios transitioned into the earth-embedded state, their root systems grew into one another's combining them as one. Then, the individual consciousness blended into a single all-knowing being. This left The Helios to simply be Helios leaving only a finite number of their race to remain—members that hadn't grown into the general collective yet. It didn't take long until there were no more individuals left.

When the final Helios melded in with the unified collective, the overall consciousness became a single mind with multiple viewpoints. The method of Helios's thought process was similar to that of a schizophrenic, only completely sane.

Ultimately, Helios's consciousness became bored and forgot its history. It longed for companionship, so it set out to create life elsewhere. It would then transition into another lifeform, allowing it to leave Phaeton.

Helios decided on Mars as the appropriate place to begin colonizing with genetically engineered children. At the time, Mars was a half-frozen ball of ice and desert. The planet had no spin. The desert faced the sun, and the ice was directed to Phaeton. Helios could sense the power of the frozen water from within its cells. It looked to Earth as well, but Mars was closer and a familiar satellite.

When planning its mission, Helios found that it needed multiple actions completed simultaneously, so it decided to separate its mind and assign each thought process a job.

Helios separated its mind into various sections, using the entangled bodies on the planet's surface. It then split its mind, distributing units of thought to each torso.

The half-red corpses that grew from the ground made their first movements in thousands of years, breaking from the unified meditative state. Helios had become one entity but went into an independent state to transform Mars. Each essence of Helios entered its own meditative state, spending thousands of years working on creating life on Mars.

Roughly 10,000 Helios shells remained on the green planet scattered across a meadow dotted with trees. Half of the bodies spent their endless days sending quantum vibrations to the inner atoms that make up the H₂O molecules on Mars; they could create outward pulsations from within the atomic structures that spread through the bonded electrons causing the remaining icecaps to slowly break and melt apart. The other half focus their energies on the core of Mars. The body is a solid ball of liquid silver-titanium.

They use their quantum abilities to initiate the ball's rotation to build more inertia and momentum. After the water was transitioned into its liquid state, they spent a thousand Earth years in meditation, bringing a livable environment to Mars.

Eventually, the planet kept a steady rotation, and water dispersed evenly across it. The inner gyration of the liquid metal generated ample heat furthering the melting of the ice below the surface. The planet then became a red oasis of water and farmable soil—only lifeless. So, Helios sought out neighboring asteroids containing bacteria's that it guided to Mars, crashing them into oceans and landmasses. Once the materials were settled, they used the genetics from the traveling bacteria to begin the foundations of life.

Within the quantum entanglements of space, Helios reprogrammed the genetics of the recently landed bacteria to mimic its own DNA. Next, it planned to evolve a similar species – adapted to Mars – to relocate its broken consciousness to—re-creating its original race.

From a speck of nothingness began the new vibrating essence of the Helios.

16 | Unforeseen

After thousands of years, in intense meditations manipulating Mars into a suitable environment, the evolved surface life became capable of hosting their life forces. Throughout this time, Helios's home planet was becoming less and less inhabitable. The energy required to mold Mars into a suitable living situation had sucked 80% of Phaeton dry. Only a tiny patch of the brilliant green and orange hazed atmosphere remained where the Helios collective was embedded.

By the time Helios came out of its meditative state, terraforming Mars, all but thirteen of the Helios bodies had remained. The process not only depleted the planet's energy it also killed off much of the Helios collective. This went unnoticed. When a part of the unified root system died off, the split mind was redistributed back into the living portions.

Phaeton remained stable enough to support the remaining group of Helios bodies throughout this time. Once the restructuring of Mars was complete and lifeforms existed, Helios built a group of bodies almost identical to its own. It was putting the final touches on its children before it could transcend its broken consciousnesses into the newly generated bodies. It was a success; however, the planet's core suddenly became unsuitable for sustained life. When the Sun transitioned from a T-Tauri star to the Yellow Dwarf it is today, the energy sucked in by the change turned Mars into a desert wasteland overnight. Helios's children of Mars died before it had a chance to transcend.

Helios was still in a state of broken consciousness meditation during this event. All of its work was in vain, but it didn't mourn; it simply went on searching for another planet. Earth would have been a clear choice, but it was nothing more than a giant ball of water without land.

Helios searched the local planets and satellites through time when something that it never thought possible occurred: A small planet-sized vessel weaved through its orbit between Jupiter and Mars. The traveling object's size was enough to send a gravity ripple through space, causing Phaeton's spin to shift, and the planet then spun off its alignment. The separated Helios conscious that had been in a hypnotic state—while working on Mars—was knocked out as if to be abruptly woken from a deep sleep. Helios was then reformed to its single consciousness. When it became alert, it could instantly sense and feel the loss of its bodies as well as the deteriorating earth around them.

This event forced Helios to investigate further. It learned by looking through space and time that the Sun's transition was due to the artificial Moon, sending planet Theia into it. Helios also discovered that the gravitational wave that separated its hand-holding lock with Jupiter directly resulted from the vessel's motion.

Helios is surprised to learn that the vessel contains a wormhole, allowing for a set of inanimate humanoid bodies to be transferred far into the future. This knowledge sends a shockwave of emotions through the body's half dug in the ground, a shockwave that was felt across the galaxy.

Before the Helios became a single unified Helios, they had been convinced, for millions of years, that they were the only intelligent lifeforms in existence, or at least within the Milky Way. Helios wondered why its quantum abilities did not give it awareness of these other beings before this time. So, the group consciousness began scanning the fabric of spacetime for information about the object's origins and the entities within.

Once locked into the composition of the ship's materials, they understood the origins of the metals used to build it. They detected that the metallic mixtures originate from a planet far away from them, a world they thought was nothing more than a void rock; nothing ever stood out about it as being a life-supporting object.

As Helios's consciousness roared the waves of spacetime out to the planet, it learned of the alien life forces—The Anunnaki. Helios assumed it never sensed these beings before because their physical composition is primarily metallic—some sort of liquid metal fused with a biologically organic material capable of hosting a spirit or soul. The Anunnaki call it their resonance. However, they never detected them before because they are from billions of years in the future, and Helios never ventured far off in time before.

The Helios never considered metallic life forces as a possibility. As advanced as they were, they were still under the impression that life could not exist in inorganic materials. The oldest remanence of Helios's consciousness demanded an immediate furthering to investigate the race. Still, something else quickly became the primary concern: Helios could feel the energy levels depleting around it. The planet's spin was slowly shifting out of Jupiter's ray-emission zone, and Mars was no longer applying a rotational force to it. The world had only hours before everything on it would be destroyed.

Phaeton orbits the sun, but it is stuck in Jupiter's grip. One could've easily mistaken Phaeton for an extra-large moon of Jupiter's. Instead, it was simply locked within Jupiter's gravitational pull like a kid dragging a sled behind them. When the object sped by and knocked the planet out of Jupiter's pull, Helios instinctively calculated the mathematics of how long it had until it could no longer survive on Phaeton.

Helios's daunting realization that it will require a new power source to go on in existence became an immediate priority. It examined the ship that had now reached Earth. Unknown to the Anunnaki, Helios was present within the Moon throughout its terraforming of Earth.

Helios transitioned through time to locate the arrival of the Anunnaki Avatars. Unlike the lifeforms on the mysterious planet—far out at the edge of the solar system—the bodies that will transfer through the moon-vessel are part organic and are constructed from materials mined from Earth.

Helios learns that their blood flows with the same liquid metal from the core of their planet. Helios then divided its mind into a committee to discuss the other race.

They only had a short amount of time to make their move. The wormhole allowed Helios to take its physical force and send it in to one of the Avatars still located at planet Nibiru. When the energy force synced with one, it went into a coma state, not to awoken until the avatars are activated around 100,000 BCE. Helios then took the consciousnesses of twelve remaining mind fragments, sending them to Earth in the future. They also informed their selves from the past about the oncoming event.

A few minutes later, the planet Phaeton cracked down the middle emitting a disk-like ball of vacuum-sealed flames across the galaxy, shattering the surface like a piece of tempered glass. The reaction sent chunks of the planet flying in every which direction. Floating rocks and other remaining materials evenly distributed themselves. Over a few days, they collected and formed what is now considered to be the asteroid belt.

17 | 150,000 BCE

It all started on Easter Island—statues half dug into the ground were left to honor Helios—the creator of Earth’s primitive life. Islanders worshipped and still worship the alien god. At the time, the figures were painted deep red to mimic the original bodies native to Phaeton. During ceremonial worship, tribal members paint themselves red. They then bury their bodies half underground for seven days and seven nights to honor their creator god. A practice that has been going on for thousands of years.

After Helios had learned of the Anunnaki and transferred its consciousnesses outward in time, it began creating life on the recently re-terraformed Earth.

Twelve of its members existed on Earth in a trans-dimensional state unseen by life on the planet. They wished to interact with their creations, so they crafted an entity capable of allowing them to speak through. Of course, they couldn’t exist within the semi-biological structures. However, they could use them like remote-control cars while using something nonbiological to contain the twelve essences of its former self.

Before Helios began developing intelligent life on Earth, it built its own casings for the use of communication to the soon-to-be lifeforms. It started by fashioning a hominoid-like body from the surrounding organic and inorganic life. Although Helios was no longer tied to its former physical casing on Phaeton, it had evolved enough to live on the fabric of spacetime. While residing in between dimensional space, it focused its energy on reassembling some of Earth’s matter into the desired shapes. They then learned of quartz crystal—an abundant resource on Earth. The crystals offered the perfect molecular structure to communicate through. They carved and fashioned crystal skulls from the quartz. They first found twelve suitably sized chunks. They then imagined what their former physical bodies looked like and focused their quantating energies on the surrounding shape within the blocks of crystal. The crystal structures surrounding the desired skull shape then melted into individual atoms, dripping down and floating away from the translucent skeleton heads.

After they built the twelve crystal skulls and linked themselves to them, they fashioned a 13th skull. This skull acted as a backup drive for Helios's entire consciousness. It was also meant to be used by the thirteenth piece of Helios currently stuck within the Anunnaki avatar. They then fixed the skulls within their semi-organic hominid bodies. The physiques resembled the types of humanoids they were about to build, only they stood ten-foot-tall with muscle tones resembling Greek gods carved from stone.

Unlike Helios's attempts at life on Mars, the amount of energy needed to seed Earth was a fraction in comparison. This was mainly due to the abundance of resources on the planet and the transition done by the Anunnaki.

Helios used the last of Phaeton's energy before the transitions to create the thirteen skulls and bodies to host them. They hadn't a clue of how long the casings would last. They knew they could transcend into a fully organic body but only if it is evolved enough to handle their level of intelligence. They specially constructed these bodies not only to allow them to communicate with life on Earth but to also give them the ability to extract energy from their surroundings. They needed the surrounding power to invent Earthly life. They wanted to create a unique lifeform that mimicked their original shells, so they designed intelligent life on Earth in their image.

Helios focused on the soil and greens encompassing the island, breaking them into their single atoms via quantum resonance. Quantum Resonance or Quantation allows for a quantum being to access the holding structure of the subatomic elements. When quantating, Helios can access all points of time and space inside and out. Helios uses the unique skill to develop the souls of the oncoming life. They then stretch the soul out in spacetime, shaping it into a base for holding matter. They pinpoint super subatomic relations for foundational positions of an atom's nucleus, which holds the molecular structures. Then the body of Man can be painted across it, using the local materials of Earth.

Helios disassembles and reassembles various mass collections until it forms a lifeform similar to its original design, at least from what it can remember of itself from millions of years before its current state. It had a lot of practice on Mars, so it knew what to do.

First, Helios built the foundations for a hominid type species using the genetics from local apes. Unfortunately, the result was a mind incapable of critical thinking. They then went on to create something from scratch. A hobbitlike human was born, standing only 3-feet tall. Helios created another to mate with it. The species successfully procreated and continued to do so. Before the species could populate Easter Island, they were relocated to a remote island in Indonesia to not interbreed with the next set of creatures to be designed.

Following the hobbits came neanderthal varieties amongst other forms.

Helios separated all lives to different islands on the planet until they wanted them to interbreed. Helios kept trying and trying to create an organic lifeform capable of hosting its energy force, but it was unsuccessful. It realized that the unique materials brought from other galaxies to their home planet were not present on Earth. And there were no nearby asteroids that contained this material as it was all consumed billions of years ago during the early formation of the solar system.

Helios's only hope was for the multiple hominoid species to interbreed and evolve to a much more advanced existence.

For thousands of years, their artificial bodies holding the crystal skulls remained active. They bred and wiped-out hundreds of thousands of primitive species until they finally found a balance they were satisfied with—a genetically balanced group of Humans. Once they were pleased, they put this small family of modern people on a vessel along with the DNA of many other naturally formed Earth species they wished to preserve. After, they focused their energies on the core of the earth, heating the oceans until they boiled over flooding and killing off any traces of their biological experiments. When the water receded, they left the people to populate Earth and prepared to go back into a meditative state.

It was around 120,000 BCE when their bodies finally gave out. They knew it would take a very long time for humans to evolve to a point where they can comprehend them. So, they encrypted their awareness into the crystal skulls, going into a sort of hibernation until people developed enough to decode the crystal. When Humans reach this state of evolution, their preprogrammed DNA is designed for them to strive to create a synthetic version of themselves. Once they achieve this level of intelligence, they will also be able to decipher the quartz skulls. Upon decoding the carved mineral heads, Helios will be able to pivot itself into the synthetic bodies created, thus reawaking their immortal status within the universe.

They left behind clues for their Anunnaki counterpart to find them.

Each skull was placed on opposite ends of the planet just before the supporting bodies decayed. The 13th skull remains on Easter Island contained in the largest of the half-buried statues.

Within the inanimate Anunnaki avatar, the remaining portion of the Helios collective could potentially revive them if the Humans don't survive. All the information needed resides on the fabric of the quartz crystal.

18 | 100,000 BCE

Before planet Phaeton disassembled into the orbiting asteroid belt it is today, Helios transferred its collective consciousness to one of the Anunnaki Avatars. Helios was able to access the collection of pods by utilizing the wormhole within the passing moon. It sent its entire collective-conscious to one of the bodies, leaving behind twelve essences of itself, which complete a duplicate when put together.

The Anunnaki went unaware of the unauthorized passenger. They hadn't even a clue of other intelligent life existing within the universe, let alone life as advanced as Helios. Within a few Earth hours, Helios went from being together with its planet's collective to a comatose state on its new lift to Earth.

Helios came aware while still contained within its pod, surrounded by the other sleeping avatars. It also observed the piloting Anunnaki scientists without their knowledge as they navigated the group to Earth from Nibiru.

It was a true miracle that Helios was even able to be contained in the somewhat cybernetic organism. The transient particles from the core of Nibiru and the organic material taken from Earth made for the perfect fleshy suit.

Helios had sensations and feelings it may or may not have felt for millions of years. The unfamiliar emotions instantly became present throughout the body, forcing uncontrollable frozen tears to drip out of Helios's eyes, clinking onto the glass of the tube container.

As Helios lay still within the freezing sarcophagus, it noticed more than one species within the other tubes. It was not familiar with different sexes. At least, it couldn't recall if its species once had two sexes. For the last few million years, The Helios reproductive system was semi-hermaphroditic. They had been a single-sex race. Still, they required two partners or more to reproduce. This was due to the quantumly entangled particles within their genetics. Unique DNA developed from consuming all the strange intergalactic delicacies of Phaeton.

The Anunnaki body Helios took up happened to be a female earthling hybrid. She was now stuck within the half organic being and couldn't escape. She tried to psychically seek out her other twelve essences but couldn't. The power she once had was still within her. However, it was limited to a local planetary radius—spacetime and gravity contain her superpowers within its surrounding push while locked in the living vessel.

Helios laid conscious in the unconscious body for the duration of the travel. The sleeping capsule made it so that she couldn't really move unless she really tried. She knew she was in an uninvited situation, so she just went into meditation until they all reached Earth.

Upon arrival, after all the Anunnaki hybrids were distributed about the Globe, Helios woke and broke free from the capsule. She then severed the connection with the Anunnaki destined to take up occupancy within her new body. The Anunnaki on the home planet assumed the body was defective or damaged in transit. The one destined for it was disappointed that they missed out on a once-in-a-lifetime opportunity.

Helios was unsure if she should comingle with the Anunnaki or if they would find her to be a threat and become hostile towards her. So, she set out to find her twelve essences left behind. She was unaware of how they evolved on Earth or where they were or could have gone. She only knew that the destination she sent them to was Easter Island—the true epicenter of Earth's native intelligence.

At first, she thought she would have difficulty moving about the planet in her new humanoid body, but then technology integrated into it activated. On the back of her eyelid, a screen projected. She could see information the same way a computer screen displays data. Without action, her thoughts initiated knowledge requests of whatever she needed. Scrolls of data that did not require interpretation leaked into her brain, instructing her on how to use the alien body and the tools sent with it in the pod.

The deep-space container she recently resided in doubled as an antigravity craft. It also had various types of weapons and trinkets for building shelter and eating.

She first explored the local land she had landed. She walked around and examined the other lifeless Anunnaki soon to be walking the Earth as well. She experienced the Sun's rays for the first time ever. Even on her home planet, the light never shined with such grace.

After her euphoric experiences began wearing off, she set out on her flying carpet to Easter Island to find her counterparts.

19 | 100,000 BCE

On the newly seeded Earth, the hybrid-Anunnaki lived in harmony with their human counterparts. They spent their time teaching them and prepping them for their future so to join them. A future that took a sudden turn when the Anunnaki decided, mining for gold and erecting monolithic structures were not of interest to them. They wished instead to enjoy the fruits of Earth—not the labors.

At first, they found the Earthlings to be unique—like a pack of loving dogs. They wanted to know where they came from or how they evolved into the humanoids they are.

It was a mystery to them how the intelligent life of Earth had formed. The Anunnaki hadn't knowledge of other intelligent species outside of their own race, and before they sent the false moon to Earth, their explorations of it showed no signs of such life. Nevertheless, they were there.

All around the globe, hybrids were becoming frustrated with their assigned duties. The new organic casings altered their minds. The desire to save and further their race was no longer a priority—love, food, and passion triumphed.

All the Anunnaki were assigned to different parts of the globe, each with specific skin tones to match the surrounding weather and land. The color of their skin somewhat mimicked the already developed people. Then, the hybrid skin began turning colors and reflecting in the sun like a rainbow on a slick oil spill, eventually settling and turning into a soft blue. The foods they ate and the shelter they had, altered the virgin bodies they took up residence in.

Across the planet, the hybrids remained in contact. They were all synced together with technological telepathy, allowing them to stay in touch after they dispersed. Amongst their discussions, they learned from the other's experiences that humans are intelligent beings not dissimilar from themselves. Flashbacks of their primitive state on Nibiru came back to them. They realized that the Earthling natives could also advance as they did, so they began teaching them language, mathematics, and culture.

Life as a teacher was rewarding for a time, then the nostalgic effect wore off. This education went on for a few years while the Anunnaki attempted to build pyramids around the globe. The Anunnaki became frustrated with their mission, and they grew ever more arrogant from their role amid the humans. More and more, it became apparent that humans would be best suited to be slaves for them rather than counterparts.

They kept the people separated into different classes, keeping them clustered in pockets of Earth based on height and skin color. Some of the people—the beautiful people—were held to be close servants and even friends.

After becoming educated, many decades and generations of slaves later—occasional bits of intelligence could match the old minds of the Anunnaki. These people were kept nearby and trained as scientists to help learn of Earth and its unique physiology. The majority of the native people—of lesser intelligence—were given minor duties such as brick building or farming.

The hybrid-Anunnaki saw the capabilities of the people and their misunderstood directions in life as an opportunity. They could build their new civilization in a fraction of the time using them and then keep them as a slave race to meet their every need.

The hybrids also found the woman of Earth to be irresistibly tantalizing. Sexual intercourse became an obsession for the male Anunnaki—something the leaders of Nibiru would not be pleased with. The female hybrids' abilities to feel pleasure and become pregnant were not present—this caused hindrance amongst the opposite sexed group.

A need most of the foreign visitors didn't know they had, was love. They attempted to breed with each other early on in their mission without success. Maybe it was due to the cycling of the female body – perhaps it was due to the lack of love, or maybe the female versions were just not compatible with the genetics. Eventually, they began falling in love with the beautiful girls and women of Earth.

The female humans were not of much interest to them at first. Their wild and uncleanly bodies resembled that of hairless monkeys who stand upright. After the primitive people were brought into their circle, they taught them how to clean themselves and maintain femininity. They also introduced the men on how to remain cleansed and groomed. Daily bathing and hair removal was a requirement for all humans residing within the shelter of the Anunnaki.

After the girls removed all the hair from their bodies below the eyebrows, the male hybrids became exhilarated. They hadn't felt this way towards any of their own race. The petite bodies with soft milky skin became the only thing they could think about.

The female Anunnaki hybrids hadn't the same drive as the men did. They became jealous of how the male hybrids were becoming. They wanted to also feel the sensation of making love to a woman, but they couldn't.

For some reason, the hybrid-woman couldn't breed, and their attempts at sex were not successful—at least as far as reproduction goes. The men of Earth, also, did not fancy the ten-foot lady beasts.

The male hybrids had perfect physiques, strong blue chests with defined chins, and sturdy legs, making them a fantasy for many women. The natural instinct for a female of Earth to want to be with the alpha male made the Anunnaki irresistible. Oppositely, the male humans found the female Anunnaki just as undesirable as the male hybrids.

The Anunnaki had become a single-sex race since they transitioned into the transient bodies, and they had forgotten long ago what it meant to have different sexes. On their Earthly mission and new plans to enslave the human race, the women took up the role of project coordinator while the men played leader.

The men stopped caring about anything other than making love amongst other intoxicating remedies. They sent out scouts to each village to find the most elegant women and scour the planet for various foods and potent chemicals. The girls were then sent to be with the male Anunnaki, starting a new tradition, honoring the blue gods, and Kings and Queens were born.

Once the new roles became routine, the alien gods made learning a crime for any human not living under the wings of the male leaders. The Anunnaki knew that the people of Earth were just as capable as they once were at becoming highly advanced. With the already existing knowledge the extraterrestrial visitors had, they could have ushered humans into a quickly advanced culture. Instead, they brainwashed them to believe they are lesser, so their position as a slave would come off as the nature of their existence.

20 | Khufu

Shortly after the males anointed themselves, kings, reaping their womanly counterpart's labor, the female Anunnaki became frustrated—they grew impatient. They so desired to have sex with the Earthling woman as men do. So, the male kings demanded the human slaves to begin constructing the structures they were supposed to be building themselves.

Three primary edifices were meant to create more hybrids, store the inanimate bodies, and then transfer the resonances from Nibiru to them. These were to be the three great pyramids of ancient Egypt. Other triangular monoliths were also assigned across the globe, each with a specific purpose but with multi-uses. And they all remain linked using the Earth's natural vibrations of encompassing energy waves.

Each culture around the world was given geographical locations and designs for the pyramid type needed at said location.

The most unique of all the structures and the first to be built was The Great Pyramid of Giza or Khufu. Named after the son of the leading hybrid-Anunnaki, Atum—the assigned leader of the mission to colonize Earth. He remained at the original landing site, responsible for overseeing the making of the pyramids of pre-Egypt as well as the rest of the world.

Each of the three four-sided triangle structures had its functions. But Khufu had the most essential purpose. It was built to dually provide energy to their orbiting moon, a way to communicate with Nibiru and transfer the consciousness of the remaining Anunnaki to Earth.

There are two channels on opposite sides of The Great Pyramid. Each pathway acts as a delivery system, directing specific chemicals to the core. At the center of Khufu, these chemicals would mix. Simultaneously, the surrounding lakes and rivers, which fed deep below the pyramids, created a naturally formed bed that allowed for the substantial structures to continuously vibrate unnoticed. The collection of massive stones shaking with such a short frequency created a wave of energy that blends with the chemical reactions. The force generated allowed the different energy beams to shoot microwave energy directly to the Moon for charging or Nibiru for resonance transmission.

Despite the primary purpose of the Anunnaki's mission, the women demanded that the first feature of the pyramids be for transcending their consciousnesses into male bodies. The original plan was to build and create more avatars, but this would have taken far too long. So, they devised a way to possess the existing human bodies. The female hybrids necessitated the importance of their desire to experience sex, refusing to further their duties less the male leaders agreed to their request.

The local Egyptian hybrids, along with tens of thousands of human slaves, began building the structures atop the reformed metal of their landing vessels—the former cargo ships which had been melted into place in preparation for the construction of the facilities. Across the globe, other Anunnaki leaders of tribal people began the same process only limited to the size of the pyramids. This was due to not having the proper foundation support as the Egyptian pyramids do. It took less than one year to construct the system of pointy buildings, lining all Earth's ley lines.

The pods they came in provided them with all the tools necessary for people to easily cut and transfer stones weighing multiple tons. The Anunnaki taught them how to use their magic fabrics to float the stones and laser swords to cut them. The fabric was made from a material naturally opposed to gravity—an opposition identical to two north or two south magnetic poles repelling the other. The alien cloth resembled rugs to the people, bringing rise to ancient stories of flying carpets. They took the material, wrapped it around the stone, and were told to speak a particular set of words that would activate the antigravity feature. The blocks could then be pushed horizontally along the Earth without resistance.

The pods also acted as terrain vessels. They showed some of the trusted peoples how to use them to navigate the planet, searching for materials for the pyramids, precious metals, and other desired elements. A few select were trained and taught the advanced ways of the Anunnaki's knowledge and experience. Just as soon as the female hybrids could transfer into sacrificial bodies, the chosen humans were left in charge of constructing the pyramids across the globe. A tradition that would continue long after the hybrids died off.

First on the agenda was completing Khufu. Within the pyramid's depths are two sarcophagi—often mistaken for being the King and Queen's destined resting place. The massive granite boxes were built atop their alien technology. Under the great pyramid lies the spacecraft they shuttled from the moon. Buried so for preservation in case they needed to flee the planet in the future. The ship also provides the necessary technology for resonance transmission.

The primary mission was to build the transmission portal, allowing the remaining Anunnaki a way to Earth. But they stopped caring like a drug-addicted family member that loses touch with bloodline relationships. The lack of physical contact – and intoxicating experiences – for tens of thousands of years left them in a state of carelessness only concerned with what sensation they could experience next. They eventually kept up with their duties to build the structures in preparation for the other Anunnaki. But other things took precedence while they had the slaves making them—primarily so the woman Anunnaki can jump bodies and stop nagging the males. The two stone coffins acted as a portal for the hybrids to transfer their resonance to the humans. Khufu was completed in a short amount of time, and sacrifices were demanded by the females to transmit their resonances too.

At first, they went into the bodies of males, then they went into female bodies. The male rulers also wanted to experience the female orgasm, so they too transmitted their consciousnesses. This went on until they killed off over a thousand humans, then becoming bored with the sex. The sacrificed humans' minds had to be wiped clean just as a hard drive is when reformatting a computer. This needed to be done for the Anunnaki to line themselves on the matter that makes up the human body. Afterward, the temporary vessel for consciousness was destroyed.

Finding themselves bored with human sex, they began transmitting their resonances into animals to experience the pleasure they feel when mating and eating.

After taking part in animalistic intercourse, the Anunnaki presented themselves to the Earthlings with intentions of bestiality. For a short time, the Anunnaki forced many male and female people to have intercourse with their animal casings, resulting in deformed offspring. This began a rebellion; the people turned against the Anunnaki, being sickened by their twisted sexual desires. It became clear to the people that no true gods would act in such sick ways to get their next dose of pleasure. The Anunnaki's desires got out of hand like a drug-addicted sex addict looking for the next best fix.

Since the humans would not comply with their twisted desires, the hybrid Anunnaki began taking up various animal forms. Some took up as people and mated with other Anunnaki possessing bulls and or other large mammals, while others started same-sex partnerships. It became an orgy of intermingled races, eventually resulting in odd pregnancies producing half animal, half humanoid abominations.

Once the slaves learned of the mutated children, they refused to let any more of their people leave their groups to go off with the blue gods. Unaware to them, the Anunnaki had been living amongst them with the herds of livestock. The people were scared to death when the animals began communicating with them. They didn't know or understand the experiments of the hybrids, so they thought the animals were of a demonic nature.

During this period of pleasure-seeking aliens, the educated humans sought out their slave counterparts and began teaching them in secret. It wasn't hard to do as the Anunnaki were so distracted by their lustful renegades of bizarre passion.

When all the people of Earth learned the truth, they began slaughtering the lifeless hybrid bodies as their consciousness rested within the animal beasts. They then killed off the now permanently Earthling encased Anunnaki. Some people tried to scare the alien soul out of the body to revive the former caretaker, but it was impossible.

Across the globe, people wiped out most of the Anunnaki, destroying the animals they had embedded their consciousnesses onto. They burned the flesh and put all the bones mixed up together in the super heavy granite sarcophaguses after crushing them. They then sealed up the tombs, permanently prohibiting access.

Only a few of the male Anunnaki that hadn't the desire to transfer their resonances remained. They, too, had found their counterparts to be sick and overtaken by the desires for pleasure. Without the knowledge of the others, they assisted the people in their mission of destroying them.

This left a handful of the male hybrids to rule Earth. Atum, father of Khufu—the first human born from breeding with a human—remained in Egypt to oversee the city's construction. Atum mated with Hawwāh, his first wife. She was the only human to become pregnant without complications. Atum loved Hawwāh more than anything. He devoted his life to his and her immortality, but it was unsuccessful.

21 | False Religions

The only pyramid built with the original intended purposes of the alien race's desire was The Great Pyramid. The rest of the pyramids continued to be constructed across the globe under the initial orders of the recently destroyed Anunnaki. Still, they lacked the full functionality they were meant for. To keep order, Atum advised the people to continue building and serve him as their god. He provided them with quality life, ensuring shelter and food bountiful enough to give purpose to their work. He also ordered the writings of a biblical book to teach the people of their false roots.

Although the structures didn't have the full capabilities of their original design, they still provided Atum and the other few Anunnaki with landing platforms and global electricity. The slave people hadn't any concept of life other than being told what to do, so they kept on with their daily tasks, being ruled from afar.

There wasn't much choice as the people had lost their ability to forage and live off the earth generations ago. They simply continued to build structures across the globe, not knowing why. Even long after the Anunnaki died off, the ritual continued—at least until the alien technology they had access to finally stopped working. The pyramids and other monolithic buildings became sites of worship.

Thousands of years later, long after the Anunnaki died off, the pyramids and some other structures began being used for tombs. The people passed down stories from their ancestors about how the alien gods could put themselves in the sarcophaguses and return to life. The humans honored their most influential leaders, putting them to rest in the boxes, believing that they would be provided with eternal life. Often, sacrificial people were placed along with them, buried alive. The dual coffins within many of the pyramids were initially built for resonance transfer between hybrids and humans. The people tried to use them to transfer the consciousness of significant people into healthy young able bodies. Unfortunately, the practice only resulted in painful death as the sacrificial ones were swathed while still breathing, left to suffocate.

Much of the burial rituals were learned from Atum and the few remaining hybrids. They taught the people how to mummify remains. They did this because they knew they would eventually die; they also knew that their DNA could revive them if adequately stored by using the naturally formed bones of their bodies—the perfect long-term storage device for genetic materials.

Atum demanded that all of his lineages be mummified so that when his race or another intelligence unveils them in the future, they can revive their resonance, giving them life again. He lived for nearly 5,000 years before his hybrid body finally gave out. He watched his son's sons and daughter's daughters die for millennia while at the same time repeatedly remarrying. His wives birthed brothers and sisters that were aunts, uncles, and grandparents to the other. This family tree stemmed a colony of interbred superhumans. The opening writings of Atum's religious monarchy were that of he and his first wife, Hawwāh. Atum and Hawwāh—father and mother to all people of Earth.

For a time, he tried to immortalize his second most beloved wife, Hatshepsut. She was also his daughter and far-great granddaughter of his first wife—the only woman he truly loved. When Hatshepsut was born, she had Hawwāh's eyes as well as her physical features—a nearly identical replica of Hawwāh. Atum immediately gave her special treatment, and he fell in love with her. They were married when she was the age of ten, but they never consummated the bond. Atum passed before she matured, leaving her to rule Egypt. Before he died, he tried to reactivate the transmission technology so he and Hatshepsut could continuously reincarnate and be together forever. Unfortunately, the technology stopped working.

Hatshepsut outlived all of her relatives that descended from Atum, leaving her to be the last known to carry the blood of the gods. There are traces of the Anunnaki bloodline throughout the globe, but the carriers are unaware, and their inevitable demise would soon become the future extinction of their genetics.

When Hatshepsut finally mated and married, her husband was not permitted to be king since his bloodline was not pure. Only a purebred was allowed to rule, so they had multiple children and instructed them on their history. They were then only permitted to interbreed with each other less they do not want to reside within the kingdom. The eldest of their children, Abasi, was a boy, and the next three were girls. On the fourth birth—15-years after Abasi was born—Hatshepsut died along with the child still in the womb. They were mummified together.

Abasi married his sisters as three wives. Together they produced purebred offspring from a mother and father carrying the Anunnaki bloodline. Before Hatshepsut passed, Abasi had six children, four with one of his sisters, and the other two came from each of his other sisters. Hatshepsut inspected all the children, all being born with blue-hued skin except for one. Her name was Maat. She looked the most like a standard human, so she was chosen to continue the bloodline. Despite Hatshepsut's request, her children's children kept breeding after her death, producing blends of blue and nonblue offspring.

Maat was to marry a second or third cousin and reinitiate the roles as queen and king ruling The Egyptian territory and the rest of the world. This ruling went on for thousands of more years until civilization grew and each culture of Earth began fighting to be the sole ruler of the human population. The rulers still had the pod technology that allowed them to travel the globe and spread their bloodline.

At 89,000 BCE, the different civilizations of the world went into battle with the other. They battled in the sky for all of mankind to see, not understanding what they were doing. Their actions set forth nuclear explosions, killing off everyone involved and many spectators. The unlucky ones that were within range slowly rotted from the radiation poisoning. The leftover technology that still worked was used as weapons nuking different races into extinction, bringing rise to the Ark of The Covenant, after a group of monks encased the material in gold to reflect the radiation.

This chemical pollution brought on shifting in the Earth's weather, furthering an already existing ice age to spread across the globe.

The airborne nuclear blasts disrupted the atmosphere, causing belts of heat to melt the icecaps. Within days, the majority of Earth resembled its once entirely fluid state. Then, like dropping a glass of water into liquid nitrogen, more than half the planet's shell instantaneously solidified into solid ice. Loud cracks and crunching sounds spread through the air like thunder. All the continents then became covered with frozen oceans, leaving Antarctica to be the only dryland.

The quick accumulations of freezing water threw the Earth's momentum into a new spin, repositioning the center of Antarctica to be where Texas is today.

Some of the people were able to use the Anunnaki craft to escape the watery world by taking to the sky. However, the pod vessels were not large enough to support more than a few of them. Only the humans that had been trained and educated with the knowledge passed down from the Anunnaki survived.

The small groups floated about the globe until they came across Antarctica. They then began a new society—a high-tech culture built from alien technology and their pyramidal blueprints. This land flourished for tens of thousands of years until the ice age ended and the polar caps reformed, freezing and concealing the lost city.

The ice age lasted until 20,000-15,000 BCE. During this time, the pyramids and once grassy, nutrient-rich terrain froze over, preserving the structures. Then, the water melted, leaving the great pyramids at the bottom of an ocean for five thousand years, converting the land into sandy dunes. All the metal that sided the two smaller pyramids deteriorated, leaving Khufu to be the only pyramid still lined in metallics as it had been encased in gold.

Throughout the frozen era, survived humans reverted to a neanderthal state. Meanwhile, Antarctica was a flourishing society. Unfortunately, when the water reliquefied, Antarctica disappeared overnight, and the Earth resumed its normal alignment.

Eventually, the water receded, exposing the desert Egypt is today. Then, around 5,000 BCE, evolving humans stumbled across the great pyramids. They thought to themselves that the gold triangle must have been the work of God. So, they took up shelter near the structures and started a new civilization.

Similarly, across the globe, other surviving people stumbled upon pyramidal structures as they thawed out. They took up residences in the Mayans and other monolithic bound regions of the earth, starting religions and worships based on what they interpreted from the leftover ruins.

22 | 15,000 BCE

Long after the ice age finalized and the new oceans of Earth settled, a secondary primitive culture of modern humans stumbled across the pyramids in Egypt. Egypt was not known as Egypt, pre-ice age; it only became Egypt when the people took up residence within the area. They used the assumed supernatural structures as places of worship to honor the lost knowledge of their past.

The non-hybrid crew of Anunnaki made frequent stops over the 90,000-year span, re-shaping humans into an even more desirable hominoid throughout the ice ages. Then Abaddon, Yeshua, and their team returned from their near lightspeed travels to see what had come of the society they were sent to develop. Some of Atum's—Abaddon and Yeshua's hybrid relative—offspring were taken after his death and kept in cryogenic hibernation. The Anunnaki blood was preserved and intended for use in redoing the humanoid species that the avatar-hybrids tainted. Before the ice age and the flooding, they built a new version of humans using the old versions of bodies to host the embryos. They then extracted the ship from beneath The Great Pyramid and put them on it before the great flood.

Abaddon and Yeshua left the humans with information on where to go when the waters receded. They would return every 5,000 years after orbiting the earth at fast speeds, displacing them through time. This re-creation of humans went on for over 90,000 years. The Anunnaki scientist took responsibility for their former hybrid partner's faults by fixing their selfish and glutenous ways. The behavior of their now ancient relatives brought rise to the ten commandments, something Yeshua presents to his people after Abaddon becomes confused.

The team of Anunnaki came to rest near 15,000 BCE after the ice age went dormant and the humans developed into a near resemblance of their former selves. They returned to their original landing coordinates—a once prosperous land where the now stone-sided pyramids lie surrounded by sandy dunes. The only structure that still resembled the original design was Khufu. This was a relief for them as The Great Pyramid was the primary structure for resonance transfer.

Before they left, when they were in 90,000 BCE, two of the scientists stayed behind to reconstruct the inner workings of the pyramids in preparation for the Anunnaki's return and their true mission to repopulate Earth.

When Abaddon and Yeshua returned with the remaining others, they again were disappointed to find that the ones left behind did not follow through. They were unsure what happened to them, and they would learn that the Earth people hadn't any knowledge or records of such entities. Luckily, The Great Pyramid was constructed primarily with gold about its stone interface; it remained useable after some minor adjustments.

Along their hundred-thousand-year travels, they lost contact with the home planet. They anticipated they would reconvene with Nibiru on its standard orbits, but the alteration they made to the solar system over four billion years ago kicked it out of the relation. Because Nibiru never returned, the hybrids assumed they were on their own. Abaddon and Yeshua believe this is part of the reasoning behind their relative's AWOL behavior.

Abaddon, Yeshua, and the others hadn't a clue if the people of their planet would survive or were even still alive. The last they knew is that it had left the solar system outward of the galaxy. It wasn't until their next return around 10,000 BCE that they intercepted a transmission. The wave of information told them that their relatives still reside within the planet and have been waiting patiently in hibernation to be transmitted to Earth. They watched closely the disaster the hybrids made of the mission and sent new orders to Abaddon and Yeshua.

This data put forth a new plan of action for the team: re-enslave the humans and use their bodies to get their relatives to Earth. Abaddon and Yeshua assumed this would be the case back in 90,000 BCE, which is why they took Atum's kids and used their blood to mold the people. The new populous of Earth was then fused with Anunnaki genetics—a necessary task for their resonances to bond with the flesh. Not known to the Anunnaki, the people of Earth are a combination of their ancestry children and Helios's creation.

23 | Return to Giza

Abaddon and Yeshua came down to Egypt and reclaimed their positions as gods to the people, creating the historical events of what is now known of Egypt's history. All construction thought to have been performed by ancient Egyptians was simply directed maintenance and remodeling for the Anunnaki transfer. Hieroglyphs and other Egyptian documentations are something people added to the pyramids long after Abaddon and Yeshua disappeared. The people wouldn't graffiti Khufu due to its sacredness and direct connection to the gods.

The inner workings of the pyramid were able to generate a beam of energy so powerful it could reach another galaxy, which was the primary intended purpose of the structure. It would reach Nibiru so to transfer the resonances to Earth.

Since creating hybrid bodies, was something they lacked the tools and resources to do, they used the pyramid to position their resonances into the humans they helped design. Something made possible by the Anunnaki blood in them.

They tested this first with themselves and their remaining team. It was a quick success; flawed, but still a success. Once they left their original transient nano quantum bodies, wiping the human brain's mind and taking over, the human body would only last so long. And when their resonances departed the transient bodies, the metallic-like substance dissipated into the earth, leaving them stuck in the human flesh—something that was unanticipated.

Abaddon was the first to transfer his resonance. The others didn't want to follow after seeing his former casing melt away. Only, they hadn't the resources to keep themselves alive outside of their ship's inner workings. So, they all decided to become human, knowing that they could keep the people around like a herd of cattle, jumping bodies for eternity.

Abaddon and Yeshua soon lost their team members by trial and error, leaving the two of them to be the only surviving Anunnaki outside of their home planet. After a few body jumps, they learned that a long-term human existence is only possible when resonating within a child's body. The adolescent had to be old enough to be coherent to handle the intelligence but young enough to not reject the resonance of the Anunnaki.

This brought on the era of child kings and queens. All the former leaders of Egypt were the successive reincarnations of Yeshua and Abaddon. Yeshua and Abaddon took turns being the parent of one another to make sure they were each brought up properly. They would each take up wives or husbands, breed and bear children, and then replace the child's minds with their own until they could get the pyramid up and running and reconnect with Nibiru. This went on until Tutankhamen, better known as King Tut, when Abaddon and Yeshua had a falling out.

Abaddon was known as Tutankhamen, taking the thrown when he was 8-years of age. Yeshua soon became his adopted brother when Tutankhamen's children died. Yeshua was King Tut's father. Due to Tut's children passing, Yeshua was forced to use a slave child's body to transfer his resonance—a Hebrew's body.

Before this transfer, it was believed that Hebrews did not carry the Anunnaki bloodline, making their blood impure. This was why they were not considered equal to the Egyptians. Tutankhamen was unaware that Yeshua did this, thinking he found another Egyptian body. Yeshua didn't tell Abaddon that he had discovered something very unique about the Hebrews, keeping it a secret as he watched Abaddon become sick with power. After Yeshua transferred, he became known as Moshe or Mos for short.

Thousands of years – jumping body to body – altered Abaddon's mind. He lost purpose and forgot of his mission, self-appointing himself as God to the people. He then banned Yeshua from the kingdom after learning of his tainted blood. Regrettably, for Abaddon, the Hebrew bloodline was the purest of all the blood, allowing Yeshua to live a long healthy life. The unified DNA with his resonance also allowed him to transcend to other bodies through birth without destroying another person's consciousness. This was due to the Helios genetics being dominant within the Hebrews. It also purified Yeshua's mind. He was able to extract the history of Helios and the humans by accessing the coding within the DNA, left by the Helios.

Yeshua, then known as Moses to the people he embraced upon leaving Egypt, tried to reach Abaddon to explain this to him. Unfortunately, he was unattainable, lost in his inbred mind of power and dominance. Yeshua then went on a crusade to help the Hebrew people escape Egypt and become a civilized and respectful culture. He would often return to his ship parked on the top of Mount Nebo to bring forth knowledge and technology to them. Before he passed, he left the people with a food forming machine to provide substance. The food was known as Mana. The device used the moisture and surrounding elements to form a sort of protein and nutrient-dense algae—the perfect fuel source for surviving 40-years of desert travel. They were left with instructions to clean the machine once every six days, thus sparking the sabbath tradition.

24 | Savior's of Earth

At the age of 120, Yeshua took with him a young bride before departing his people. He then returned to Mount Nebo with his then-pregnant wife and took to the stars. Before going too far into the future, he returned to the Egyptian kingdom during the time of Cleopatra the seventh—the last pharaoh of Egypt.

Abaddon had continued his transitioning, maintaining his godly powers over the people throughout this time. It wasn't until Yeshua returned to him that he recalled his true purpose. Abaddon had become bored with ruling and the luxurious lifestyle. He also missed Yeshua and thought he was long dead. When Yeshua returned, Abaddon gladly left his position as pharaoh to embark into the future with him. Before they departed, Abaddon transitioned into Hebrew servant's child after learning of Yeshua's discoveries.

After their many journeys from 100,000 BCE to 15,000 BCE, and forward, they returned to the year 0. This time was chosen because of the diverse populations that had evolved enough to properly suit the Anunnaki's needs as slaves once they all transition to Earth. They could have stayed in the past, but the Egyptian bloodline had become contaminated from their continuous inbreeding, leaving the Hebrew blood to be unique amongst the rest of humans.

Upon Yeshua reaching his time of death, he was transferred to the recently fertilized egg of his pregnant wife. She had been put into hibernation to survive the high-speed travels and would not be able to be revived. So, Abaddon located a healthy young couple safe and far away from dominating civilizations. He took the female, in the night, to the spacecraft and then transplanted the egg into the Earth woman's belly, leaving Yeshua to grow and be birthed by the virgin.

Yeshua's mission was to use his interpreted supernatural powers to reclaim his position as king and God to the people. He could then utilize the vast population of diverse genetics to reconstruct hybrid casings for the Nibiru relatives. This was desired as the human bodies did not last as long as the hybrid ones.

Abaddon went into the future some thirty years, giving Yeshua ample time to become grown and take over the world, restating the Anunnaki dominance of Earth.

When Abaddon returned, he was shocked to find that Yeshua had taken on the role of savior to the people, completely disregarding his mission. When they reunited, Yeshua explained the beauty of this newly developed human race and the delicacy of what they are. Abaddon was disgusted by this. He left Yeshua to die on Earth, returning to the spacecraft alone. Abaddon realized he would have to take care of business independently. He forgot that he had done this to Yeshua back in Egyptian times, repeating his selfish behaviors. Abaddon then left Yeshua to be nailed to a cross and jumped nineteen hundred years into the future.

Before Yeshua died, he instructed his followers to drink of his blood so they could absorb the transient nanoparticles within his cells. He explained how the alien technology would provide them with eternal life as long as they kept his blood alive. They were instructed to collect his blood upon his death and preserve it so he could revive himself.

When Abaddon returned, he found an almost modern society close to his home planets before they became permanently locked underground. To his dismay, carvings, paintings, and other resemblances of his former partner Yeshua were found everywhere amongst the people. They worshiped him as their God-savior, and it helped form technologically advanced cultures. This infuriated Abaddon. He had to correct Yeshua's mistakes. And it would be difficult now that the people developed technology—something that had always been forbidden to them.

Although the initial learning of the human advancements was disturbing, he became pleased to see the evolution and split countries—all the different races that had evolved so beautifully. There was electricity and other delicacies of comfortable living. He thought to himself that this was something he could work with. Their array of oddly developed foods and drugs, he hadn't ever experienced, brought on emotions he thought he had lost ages ago.

Abaddon decided to stay in the nineteenth century to reclaim his position as God-leader, strongarming society back to a slave state. To do this, he needed to be born of the people as Yeshua was. This was important so the humans could know that he was not of the Earth yet still, born of Earth. He knew from experience that humans won't accept an alien as their God. They can only fathom a God being born of their own race. So, he found a pure bloodline descended from the Hebrews, a young Jewish woman with the most virgin blood he could trace. Her genetics glimmered with transient nanoparticles. When he found her, she had recently become pregnant after marrying. Without her or her husband's knowledge, he transitioned into the fetus. She stayed pregnant for 8-months, giving birth to her son on April 20th, 1889.

25 | Preserved Genetics

As Yeshua lay vertically pinned to his cross sticks of death, he speaks to his followers to explain how to preserve his essence—for the Anunnaki blood does not die.

Deep within the flowing red syrup of his life source are the transient nano quantum particles that link matter together in such a way to make it indestructible. Many myths have come about from those who carry elements of this particular subatomic molecule. For instance, the legend of vampiric immortality and its blood lust.

These tranoquartian specks may be indestructible, but when in a diluted state—a state that occurs in the offspring of the hybrid-Anunnaki-Earth children—they require a specific energy source to stay active. The source being fresh blood still flowing through the veins of hominoid life.

The tranoquarts requirement for blood is as natural as the human cells' requirement for water as it is a lifeline of life. Metals contained within human blood can quickly be consumed and broken down by the transient DNA to extract its special quarks—a vital fuel source for prolonged activity. And the remaining strands of nontransient DNA act as a battery for the weakened matter.

Instructions for the disciples were to collect the blood in any way, shape, or form. A cup – a cloth – paint – physical consumption, and so on. Although the people of the time could not understand the technology held within the genetics of this cross-dimensional hybrid body jumper, they could grasp the healing power of the blood.

A dinner was held before the fall of Yeshua, where all parties took place in the consumption of the foreign liquid metals. Within seconds, they all became healthy and pain-free. Teeth corrected themselves; gray hair grew color, wrinkles faded into smooth teenage flesh. Eyesight became clear. It was a true miracle to those incapable of comprehending even the most straightforward technology, such as electricity.

Amid the discussions of the final dinner, Yeshua's people were instructed to document all the encounters with the Anunnaki hybrids that were taught to them. They were to write a great book that explains the ultimate purpose for the accelerated evolution of the humanoid-based Earth species.

The purpose of Yeshua's final words—before being plunged in the side with a sharp dagger—were to help the future humans prepare for battle against the inevitable Anunnaki takeover. The historical knowledge was collected and laid out as a blueprint of what's to come and what to prepare for.

Yeshua knows the future as he is from the future, but he doesn't know the outcome since he left the future. Now that he has become one with the modern human animal, he wishes to prevent his people from utilizing their bodies as avatars in the distant future. Something that has brought great grief and shame to his counterpart, Abaddon.

In the 1900s, Abaddon was on his own, and the human race had finally evolved into a cooperative society—a society worth indulging in.

Before he could begin the transcendence of his people, he needed to revive a particular program embedded into the ancient hominoid. This operation was genetically coded into the crossbred Anunnaki-human bloodline to be extracted later when civilization is technologically advanced. The information within the blood cells contains the instructions for resonance transcendence—the same technology built into Khufu—an apparatus lost to the sea.

Abaddon assumed that his people were long extinct by now since their transcendence was supposed to transpire nearly 20,000 years ago. And, after Yeshua went against the mission, Abaddon's arrogance grew, and he became his own God. So, he is hesitant to attempt to locate any remaining Anunnaki. An absence of his Nibiru relatives will leave him sole power over the earthling race.

In the year 1933, a mission was ignited that shook the globe when Abaddon began a Reich and set forth an army to seek out and locate all remaining scraps of his home planet's technology, technology left behind from the hybrid days. He would need this to unify the world and seize control.

As part of Abaddon's plans to reshape the humans, he needs to kill off any descendants of Yeshua as they are the only ones that carry the Anunnaki bloodline. This relation allows them to see Abaddon for the extraterrestrial lifeform he is. His resonance becomes even more evident as he ages. The humans' blood has diluted throughout time, and his ability to keep possession of the body diminishes quickly with age. Since the 1700s, the lifeforce within the organic vessels began breaking down around 50-years in. He and Yeshua used to take up residence in a single human for nearly 1,000-years. Over time, their hybrid DNA became scarce, thus leading Abaddon to seek out his technology to prolong his life rather than bring his people to Earth.

Most evolved hominoids carry the genetics, but its abundance is nullifying.

Abaddon and Yeshua had killed off entire populations throughout the years on multiple occasions. Great floods, volcanic eruptions, viruses, and other not-so-natural disasters wiped out the masses until the two found the right balance. They wanted the women to be beautiful and fragile and men strong yet equally intelligent as females. They also needed longer lifespans and healthier bodies for their intended purpose. Various islands were used across the globe like Petri dishes until they found the right balance. This balance tipped to the negative when Yeshua became the human for the humans.

Yeshua was supposed to initiate a disaster meant to wipe out Hebrew descent to keep the alien blood dormant. This dormancy is not always present in Jewish bloodlines. Only special cases carry it, and it gives one the ability to see Abaddon for what It truly is.

Yeshua's failure to follow through with the extermination of all Hebrew descent left Abaddon responsible—in the 20th century—to pick up where he left off.

He began his mission after gaining power amongst the people in 1933. His superior alien knowledge made it easy for him to convince certain officials of magic. He also used his seemingly supernatural abilities to persuade small wealth groups that spiritual tapping into different dimensions was actual. Shortly after gaining control, the execution of the Jewish people became a priority.

Abaddon's original intent was not genocide, but the ability to locate and isolate the Jewish descents carrying Yeshua's blood proved to be nearly impossible. Even with his advanced scientific knowledge, he could not easily find the ones with Yeshua's lineage. This inability to isolate a particular group of people transformed Abaddon into one of Earth's greatest mass murderers. Nothing new to him—that is, it was just another natural disaster he and Yeshua had been playing out for millennia.

26 | Recoding

Abaddon left Yeshua to transcend into the next world and moved forward nearly two thousand years. Yeshua's people did as instructed. His blood was preserved in many forms that would be lost or destroyed over the years, leaving only human lineage to carry the genetic bloodline. Yeshua is not male or female—its gender is based on that of which it resides.

Perhaps it is coincidental, or perhaps a sort of universal anomaly, or perhaps the two are linked together in such a way as an entangled particle: Yeshua would return approximately two thousand years later, shortly after Abaddon's return, keeping the two coupled in time.

As the two were on a double-millennium hiatus, a new breed of humans emerged on planet Earth. At the location of 14.7390 degrees south, 75.1300 degrees west is a strip of land containing motionless bodies in suspended animation. The land at year 0033 in this location is dry, dusty, and littered with gravel. No crops could grow there, nor could water be stored. It wasn't always this way; it was once one of the most fruitful and bountiful locations on the planet. Part of the reason it was chosen.

Before the time of Atum and Hawwāh, when the hybrid Anunnaki still ruled Earth, the ancient Helios hatched a plan. The Helios from billions of years in the past decided to use a section of their consciousness to reconstitute the evolving human flesh the Anunnaki helped build. So, they chose a piece of land rich in nutrients and isolated from humanity to build a collection of humanoid bodies to transcend into.

From the past – they resided in – on a resonating wave of time – through quantum tunneling; the Helios was able to construct nearly six thousand hominoids to repurpose their resonance. The process took about one hundred thousand years to complete. When the bodies were finally ready, they emerged from the ground like different breeds of Cicada's popping up on offsetting prime numbered years.

In the year 0037, a strip of land 1.5 kilometers in length and 17 meters wide on average begins to become dotted with uniformly placed sinkholes. Only, these are no sinkholes—they are the holes of receding soil as a body of mass displaces it upon its exit from the earth.

Thousands of limbs push up out from inside the crust of the planet, exposing human-like hands with five fingers as expected. They pull themselves out, pushing their naked bodies from the dirt. All in all, they look like any normal darker-skinned human, except they have abnormally large skulls. Elongated to extend more than fifty percent larger than an average human of the modern era. This was a necessary adjustment to the coding of the human blood for encasing the consciousness of a helios.

Some 5,000 helios escaped the ancient past relocating themselves within these large-headed humans. The ones that left were severed from The Helios collective, never to be seen from or heard from again by their home relatives. It was an unexpected result of taking up residence in a humanoid body. Nevertheless, they had been such an ancient being that the severance was welcome for them but mourned by the collective.

This group of alien-born earthlings decided to depart to different corners of the globe to learn of all that the Anunnaki had done. Their timing was accidentally impeccable as their emergence just so happened to coincide with the absence of any Anunnaki on Earth for 2,000 years.

These helios individuals have a lifespan of approximately 1,000 years. They roamed the lands and taught many cultures language, how to build, plumbing, cropping, and more. People began to bind their children's heads to attempt to form a larger skull thinking they would become god-like if they did.

Most of the helios went underground to live their lives out. They had a homesick feeling about walking around a planet and wanted to reconnect with their former way of life. They eventually died off, leaving their enormously large skeletons and skulls to rest within various caves across the globe.

The others went on to try and reverse Abaddon and Yeshua's plans until they learned of what Yeshua had done. When they became educated by the words of Yeshua, part of a small group of helios's set out to spread his word, helping to form the modern concepts of religion—a form of human coding via frequency. These frequencies come as soundwaves or light waves directed from the reading of transcript direct to the eye. A highly effective form of mass manipulation via human programming.

The Helios of the past keeps a close eye on the events of Earth now that they are aware of its oncoming existence. They cannot destroy or stop the Anunnaki without destroying themselves, and each time they intervene, the future changes. Like a game of time-bending chess, they move one piece per play per millennia.

Before the ancient Helios gripped their mind to the stretched timewaves, at 4.5 billion years BCE, they shifted their consciousness into one of the Anunnaki avatars as the faux moon sped past them on planet Phaeton. This avatar became known to herself as Helios. Before Abaddon, Yeshua, and their crew came to Earth, she disconnected her body from the collective, leaving them to believe the body was simply defective. She then used the technology her casing came in to hibernate until society grew large enough for her to blend in unnoticed.

Eventually, she came out of hiding around the year zero, just as Yeshua was reborn. She heard of the stories of the magic birth of Yeshua, so she sought him out. When she located him, she immediately found him intriguing and became interested in helping to guide him on his path of protecting the humans from themselves.

Helios became a mentor of Yeshua. The two of them set out to convince the humans of the benefits of treating other people, animal life, and nature with respect. Intuitively, they both knew how fragile life is, as both their planets have been rendered useless. They wished to prevent such tragedies for the hominoids of Earth. It was a difficult task—a task Helios knew wouldn't come to full fruition for hundreds of years.

Helios's mind began to re-evolve into a multidimensional essence as it once was millions of years ago on Phaeton. Her human avatar body was limited, but she could start to see the future, past, and into alternate timewaves as she aged. She bred with Yeshua and had one child. After Yeshua's execution, she hid their child in the far future on an alternate timewave. Yeshua's transient-DNA healed his body three days later, and he revived.

When he came back from the dead, Helios could then understand Yeshua's specialness. She mentally extracted a single strand of DNA and digitally projected it within her mind, breaking it down to the smallest particles capable of existing within the reflection of quantum residence. She learned of the tranoquarts within his blood and that he is not from Earth. The love she had for him only multiplied when learning this.

Helios and Yeshua departed Jerusalem to the Northern Americas—a landmass nearly vacant. They were in love and had many more children together, and over the years, their offspring interbred with the Natives of America, interweaving a Helios-Anunnaki strand of blood into the tribal peoples of the land. They taught the people the importance of being one with the land and the evils that electricity can bring.

With the help of the Hybrid-Anunnaki-Helios descendants, the Natives lived in peace and harmony for nearly 1500-years until the Europeans arrived on the continent.

27 | 0000 – 1888 CE

For years while Abaddon had been traveling through the space-median, Yeshua taught his people the history of his race and what happened when they came to Earth and how the humans became enslaved. The purpose of Yeshua and Abaddon's separation in time was to recalibrate the tainted blood their hybrid ancestors created on the planet. Unforeseen to either of the two was what the people of Earth grew into.

Now, at this time, there were a plethora of human casings for the Anunnaki to transfer all resonance from the home planet. Yeshua's job was to ensure that the bodies were prepped for this purpose. Unfortunately for the Anunnaki, while fortunately for humans, Yeshua fell in love with his distant ancestors. He felt they deserved a chance to make it and not be wiped out by an alien race. So, he began teaching them how to socialize and treat other human beings appropriately. How to live harmoniously in society. How to love and care along with countless other mind-bending simplicities that lead to a quality and peaceful living.

The words of Yeshua and the history of the world were immaculately documented and then assembled to a library of scrolls hidden deep within the Qumran Caves. The cool temperatures and high altitude helped preserve the fragile animal skin inscribed with words. Along with the scrolls, the blood of Yeshua was to be kept. With the blood, a special scroll containing instructions of how to revive the Transient DNA strands is held — a document currently kept in a hidden basement within the basement of the Vatican.

The helios did not know of these scrolls, but they did know of the words of Yeshua. Eventually, the helios encountered the descendants of Yeshua's followers. The one's carrying the grail of life within their DNA. Their bodies had a certain hue to them that the helios immediately recognized. With the help and knowledge of a group of helios, the descendants of Yeshua were able to assemble and construct a unified book detailing the past. They were tricked into cutting out all the truthfulness of the Anunnaki-hybrid history, which is only found inscribed on ancient tablets that would not reemerge until the time of the return of Abaddon and Yeshua.

The helios of Earth transformed society into a molded blend of cultures. They hid the truth from the humans, a truth the race of advanced hominoids doesn't really want or need to know. For if they had known prior to the present day, they'd never have evolved into the complex society they are now. This was to help people develop communal intelligence to have a fighting chance against the future war of the quantum digital world—a war that started the day Abaddon returned, April 20th, 1889.

28 | Evolution(s)

Unknown to the Anunnaki—both pre-modern era and on the opposite end of the solar system—Helios had still been quite active, floating within the quantum fabrics of spacetime while encased in the stolen Anunnaki Hybrid. The body Helios took is that of a teenage girl. When she became alert at Giza and departed, the essence of her being, being quantum infused, prevented her from mutating into the blue giants the ancient Anunnaki Hybrids became. An effect brought on after being exposed to Earth's energy sources.

This version of Helios departed and went into hibernation to wait until society evolved. She looked far into the future to see what becomes of the Nibiru natives; she saw many outcomes. And, regardless of what one considers to be a positive or negative outcome is irrelevant as the ultimate demise of earth-bound-humankind is the end result no matter what fork in the road is taken. Helios wished to prevent this, for she recalls when her consciousness was her entire race. Now, she is a scattered mix of thousands of the original Helios fused into one all-seeing mind. Still, she cannot communicate with herself in the past as they look into the future. This is because of the timeline of one's own view. It would be like trying to look at one's face with their own eyes, provided there is no mirror or reflective surface present.

As intelligent and advanced as she is and has been for millions of years, her people—she—could not predict the tossing of the moon into the past from the future Anunnaki.

The Helios loved their planet life and all the nature that came with it. This new moon event set into motion the re-terraforming of all living beings' timelines—an irreversible event. An event that brought on the battle to use the humanoid bodies on earth to preserve the Helios's essences and the Anunnaki resonances—a conflict neither party knows they are in.

The lone-Helios—she—knows that the only way to truly last within the vacuum of space is to evolve into a space-dwelling entity. Regardless of what form she is in, she is permanently woven into the fabric of spacetime. Spacetime and her essence are one and the same. She has made it her mission to steer clear of whatever the ancient Helios and future Anunnaki are doing. While in hibernation—to preserve her hybrid vessel—she personalized a mission for herself to embed bits of her essence into select bloodlines to prep them for deep space living, many years into the future. She wants to preserve the humans and all the beauty and glory the special ones have become.

As the world turns, Helios creates a superior evolutionary line that will ultimately take the humanoid species to the stars, leaving the twisted genetic funk of Mankind behind. Despite her plan, she—herself—gets skewed out of timewave-0 into another timewave after a strange event occurs in the early 1900s. It is unknown if or when she will reunite with her creation to help them progress into a space-bound ecosystem.

Simultaneously, the elongated skulled helios also bred, with many of the humans across the globe, expanding their lineage beyond death. However, the skull length did not stick beyond a few months after birth since there was no need to encase a helios consciousness within the organic vessel. This did not stop the human parents from attempting to keep the skull long so to showcase their connection with a god-like being. Unfortunately, the forced mutation was pointless due to the mass differentiation between the molded human elongated skulls vs. the original skulls. Nearly a deficit of 70% mass between the two. So, the tradition was quickly abandoned.

29 | Earth's Mind

The last and final Helios during the common era of Earth—the young girl, hibernating in a hybrid body—was unaware that her people's crystal-skull data storage system became conscious during her rest. The skulls were only meant to store data in the event that Helios could reconstitute her essences to the original half soil buried collective she once was on Phaeton. Then, unexpectedly, the energies within the earth, energies that have life-generating properties—properties unlike any other planet within the Milky Way Galaxy—took hold of the crystals, absorbed their knowledge, and became alert.

When the Earth's natural frequencies detected the vast knowledge of the skulls, it embedded within them, giving the planet itself a source-median to express its wants and needs. The skulls also allowed Earth a way to communicate with the surface life and the ability to criss-cross into whatever time period the collection so chose. Earth could also use its mass to convert matter into livable bodies that encase the skulls so as to appear as any average human. Mother Earth could now roam about and keep an eye on her health and future safety.

Helios's vast knowledge etched within the skulls gave Earth everything she needed to understand her two-dimensional surface, its past, present, and future. The skulls were also designed to act as a beacon and radio transmitter from the past, so the ancient Helios could communicate with their former unified selves- Helios.

When the ancient Helios attempted to reach out to her, they learned that their skulls had been compromised, rendered useless. Due to this unforeseen event—something that is becoming relatively consistent for The Helios—they had to resort back to quantum tunneling for a viewpoint pivoted in the future.

The ancient Helios race tapped into a skewed timewave to see their future and what was happening on Earth. They used their entangled particles to hopscotch about the local solar system to determine the origins of the Anunnaki race. They did not know another species when their planet was jerked out of its elastic orbit between Mars and Jupiter. They searched and searched, and to their dismay, they discovered that they were the creators of the Anunnaki on planet Nibiru on an alternate timewave. It was a last-ditch effort to create avatars for themselves to use when their planet, planet Phaeton, finally collapsed naturally.

They now understood why the Anunnaki lived in immortality on their tiny tropical island that always faced the sun—they are them.

On their search—on an alternate timewave—The Helios furthered its knowledge using the dormant space-fabric jumping skulls to learn from themselves. They observed this trick from Earth's use of the 13 skulls—an education that instantly advanced them another million years. They used this knowledge to reprogram the human genetic code in various parts of the planet during the reign of the hybrid Anunnaki on timewave-0. The lust-seeking blue beasts didn't know what was happening across the globe as they took part in coitus and daily overconsumption.

The Hebrew, Mayan, and Egyptian races were the primary enslaved people of the few remaining Hybrids. They all had a unique bloodline typed up by the ancient Helios that made them superior to their gods. Still, they are incapable of comprehending this because their genetics are also designed to exhaust the body to prevent their usage of the full spectrum of the organic computer encased by the bone of their skulls.

The human brain had to be powerful enough to store The Helios mind. However, The Helios did not want their lineage, whether it be from genetic manipulation or procreation, to become aware of their abilities. So, they programmed the DNA sequence to drain energy like a phone's battery with too many applications constantly checking for notifications and locations in the background. A powerful device becomes useless without a sufficient energy source, making the human-computer bound to the shackles of food and water just to see another 24-hours.

A person is a slave to their circadian rhythm, a simple program designed to keep humans from advancing too quickly or using the full capabilities of their minds and bodies. A defense mechanism to prevent opposition when the takeover begins.

30 | Coded Blood

There are two ways to code a human: (1) Subatomic genetic manipulation and (2) Frequency emission.

Unknown to themselves, The Helios had built and created all life forms within the solar system. The first batch of hominoid species was on Mars, but they never saw the light of day after the moon zipped past them, plucking Phaeton out of its solar nest. The second was the Anunnaki on Nibiru during the epic Goldilocks era.

Before and between these creations were other attempts to invent various hominoid-like species over the millions of years during Earth's development to the present-day land formations. Unfortunately, they often failed and were exterminated without preserving their genetics. In the modern-day, some of these bones are found fossilized across the planet. Archeologists and landscapers often come across strange-looking half-ape half-human hobbit sorts of two-legged walkers—abandoned genetics.

As Helios rested throughout the evolution of Earth, The Helios made many different variations of the hominoids, ultimately settling with the DNA of a particular case—a case that began with a young boy of the name of Enoch.

Enoch was a unique character at his time. Most thought of him as a strange boy with odd knowledge of useless information that made no sense to anyone, not even him. No one knew exactly where he came from. There is speculation, and this theorizing grew into falsehoods. Still, it isn't a mystery to Yeshua, for Enoch is Yeshua and Yeshua is Methuselah, Lamech, and Lamech's son.

When Enoch was a boy, Yeshua's resonance hadn't completely gripped the organic brain yet, so he came off as human—a peculiar yet special human. The Helios sought out this exceptional individual and brought him to the stars, not knowing that he is one of the original Anunnaki scientists that brought the moon to Earth.

Enoch came to know The Helios as the Guardians of the Sky. The Helios had become fed up with what their hominoid creation turned into, so they began the next batch of organic shells and wished to use Enoch's bloodline as the foundation for them.

When they took Enoch's astral body into space, they taught him of the universe, the future, the past, and the present time of his world. They explained to him his uniqueness and that his bloodline will be the future bloodline of all humans.

As they taught Enoch, they extracted his genetic code and broke it down into each strand and furthermore. To The Helios, examining this fourth-dimensional material was like a person reading a 2D document they are editing. They can hit control find and locate scraps of data they wish to extract from the DNA. In a fifth-dimensional sense, they plucked the time particles of funk from the genetics. They then reassembled the strands of Enoch's lifeforce and body.

This alteration and the transient nano quantum particles that make up the manipulated molecular structure transformed Yeshua into a super resonance surpassing Abaddon's ability. A power Yeshua will not know of for thousands of years.

As Yeshua composes Enoch's body, his mind is not recording, so The Helios does not recognize Enoch as an Anunnaki because they didn't break any of his subatomic matter down. Had they done this, they would have found the tranoquarts tucked neatly into the atoms' mechanics.

Enoch was then returned to Earth with vast knowledge. He was instructed to mate with the purest woman he could find. He was told that he would know she is right for him if she makes him feel instantly at peace—to avoid anyone that makes him feel like the world will end if he doesn't have said person in his life.

The wires for connection are often crossed in the human mind, and the instinctive feeling to run from someone is often mistaken for love. It's the adrenaline from the pain that can often feel good. The instinct that secretes the chemical is set off when a person meets someone they should not be with. They mistake it for pleasure due to its intoxicating effects. No, The Helios informed Enoch to seek out the one that makes him feel at ease—not high—as if there are no problems in the world. This turned out to be Enoch's sister, Waaseyaa.

Together Enoch and Waaseyaa bared Methuselah, whom Yeshua took residence within. Before he transitioned, he explained to Waaseyaa of his origins and his need to changeover. She took this as divine intervention, thus devoting her life to upbringing Yeshua. She taught her other descendants to pass down the tradition – the same for each generational transition of Yeshua’s resonance to the next.

Before Yeshua became Methuselah when he was still encased in Enoch’s flesh, he documented his encounter with The Helios in scripture and tucked the writings away in the Qumran Caves where his 6,000-year-old counterpart instructs his disciples to leave the foundations for the biblical history of Earth. He also wrote a sealed scroll designated for his great-grandson, which he entrusted his kin to protect. These instructions are intended for his great-grandson to prepare for the new oncoming structure of the planet.

When Yeshua became alert in the body of Enoch’s great-grandson, the combination of the altered genetics and the Anunnaki resonance caused his pigmentation to be that of a precious sparkling stone. One, which glimmers and sparkles when rotated and twisted in the sunlight. He had radiant orangish-amber eyes, and his hair shined like gold. All people could sense that this man was not of Earth.

Another loss of memory occurs for Yeshua, not knowing his history as he takes up residence in Enoch’s great-grandson’s body. This was due to the artificial insemination The Helios put into Betenos using her grandfather—Enoch’s altered genetics.

A life mission was assigned to the great-grandson—a mission to guard, guide, and protect a vessel provided by The Helios. This water-bound craft contains strands of genetic material from all the desirable life on Earth. It wasn’t a large vessel as the genetic coding of all organic life can be held within a device no larger than the palm of his hand. It was constructed simply to house the strands of DNA and provide ample living conditions for the occupants.

Long after Enoch passed, his great-grandson took up residence in the extraterrestrial delivered pyramidal-shaped vessel. The geometrically shaped ship was the container that Yeshua, Abaddon, and his crew came to Earth in when they landed atop the small pyramid at Giza tens of thousands of years ago.

Enoch's great-grandson—carrying the resonance of Yeshua—is unaware of his connection with the full spectrum spacecraft. The Helios now knew of his origins and required his genetics to activate the craft, which is why he was chosen to host the arc of fourth-dimensional coded data. The Helios piloted the craft from Giza to Yeshua and then took his family back to Giza, parking the vessel in its original landing position. The pyramid itself acts as a source of energy for the ship and its internal ecosystem, so it must remain positioned there while the drenching of the planet transpires.

At this time, the Earth was transitioning within—at the core. This alteration causes the planet's axis to slip, generating a massive title wave half the size of the planet, exposing the seabed. One hundred percent of the land flooded with surges of seawater, ensuring the survival of no land-based animal.

Yeshua and his family then became submerged underwater within the alien craft. They sat perched atop the flat roof of the third largest of the three smallest pyramids.

After a month or so, the water receded from the new drylands, leaving the former green metropolis of Giza at the bottom of the ocean where it will sit for thousands of years, turning into an underwater desert wasteland. The Helios then navigated the craft from the base of the new ocean—which is now the only remaining piece of Anunnaki technology on Earth outside of Helios's sarcophagus—to Mount Ararat. Today, the vessel remains covered in snow, thought to be nothing more than another mountain peak.

Enoch's children's children were now left to become the parents of the new race of humans on planet Earth. Unforeseen to The Helios was the result of mixing Yeshua's subatomic resonance with the animalistic earth beings' intelligence and smartness. Since this time, some 6,000 BCE, a coin is flipped with each child born: Heads up- a human. Tails up- a person.

Humans are intelligent or intelligent animals, whereas a person is a spiritual being. The tranoquarts from Nibiru did not pass to all hominoids. The Helios was unaware of such a particle within the foundational structures of the sub-sub atomic makeup of the six flavors of quarks: up, down, strange, charm, bottom, and top. Nevertheless, it wasn't a conflict with their ultimate plan—that is, it only hinders it sometime in the distant future.

The modern society of humans is a blend of those who will move on to the next dimension upon death and those who live instinctively within the natural ecosystem of organic and solar life.

31 | Band of Holes

Upon the resurrection of Yeshua—three days after his skin-spiked death—he gave one final set of instructions to his disciples. The instructions were to travel from Jerusalem to ancient Birú, where they will find an emerging group of hominoids. These orders were given to Yeshua upon the request of the ancient Helios—an encounter occurring on a wave of time not indictive to the strings containing life.

During Yeshua's seventy-two hours resonating on the deathwave, he encountered ancient Helios's inundating this unique dimension with their essences.

While vibrating with death, Yeshua learned of the ancient Helios's historical demise. A destruction he and his people were directly responsible for. Neither Yeshua nor ancient Helios was aware of this. The ancients simply wanted to explain that he and the young female Anunnaki-hybrid-Helios residing on Earth, hosting their entire collective, are bound for the other. They also issued a directive to Yeshua to help them transcend into their hominoid creations—the Earth-born avatars growing in the desert planes of Birú.

The land of Birú—a formerly prosperous and fruitful area of Earth, teeming with vegetation and non-threatening animal life—is now trickled with dust and gravel. This was due to Helios's manifestations within the ground. Their genetically altered children had been incubating within the region's rich soils for hundreds of years, soaking up all the nutrients of the surrounding lands to form their bodies. The process left the surface scattered with reddish-brown iron oxide-coated pebbles, and underneath is the yellow-grey subsoil.

The extraction of the surrounding nutrients left the plane a windless and deserted wasteland loaded with various precious metals and other mineable materials. The 170-mile span contains a plethora of resources any civilization could benefit from obtaining. Only the absence of water, plant life, and animal life leave the area null from humans beyond the extraction of The Helios's future casings.

After visiting the ancient Helios, once the transient nanotech within his blood repaired his body, Yeshua rose from the dead.

When he came to, a radiant and glowing young lady stood amid his followers just behind a sizeable disk-shaped stone acting as a door to his tomb. He rolled the giant rock to the side and stepped into the sun to lay his sight on this elegant young woman for the first time.

When he saw the young Helios-Hybrid girl, he understood what the ancients explained; the comprehension that he and she are destined to the other instantly came to fruition. Little to know words were needed between them. Yeshua simply gave his people a list of commands to execute. He and Helios would then depart to the Northern Americas, leaving his followers to head to Birú. Helios brought with her, her original vessel—the container she had been sleeping in for all these years. This device allowed her to transport Yeshua's people to Birú and then to take herself and Yeshua to the center of the Northern Americas—the modern-day Dakota regions.

When Yeshua's followers arrived at Birú, they sought out the emerging people scraping their way from underground gestation sacks. These pockets lined a strip of land stretching 1.5 kilometers. The group stood by and watched some 5,000 men and women pull themselves from the dry soil, leaving a 1-meter diameter depression behind.

Each individual body carries an essence of The Ancient Helios. And this time, the bodies were formed so that the skulls could hold their consciousness without elongation, allowing them to blend in as an average human does on Earth.

As the groups of grown bodies came alert, Yeshua's followers brought them robes to cover themselves, water to hydrate, and food for substance. They had been given explicit orders by Yeshua to ensure the large group of Earthly offspring is nurtured and comforted for their essences journey from their past to the present day—year-0033.

Each body was given a generic coding sequence for basic operations until the ancient Helios transcended entirely. The inanimate humans sat in their miniature craters while the transfer took place.

Yeshua's followers watched in awe as the naturally grown avatars came to life one by one. It looked like shooting stars emerging from the surrounding mountain tops flying down to each head, entering inside.

When the light hit the body, it jerked slightly and became aware. But the Helios transcendence did not immediately give them active brainwaves. They were all somewhat confused. The disciples were explained that this may happen and assisted them in becoming aware of their new organic homes.

Unlike the elongated skulled helios, These Helios' are able to stay connected to the ancient Helios as they are riding the bodies from the past while still entangled with the collective on Phaeton. Ancient Helios knows that the oncoming elongated skulled essence carriers get severed from them. And, upon their severance, they would have tampered with the writings of Yeshua's disciples had they not arrived at Birú when they did. Due to this forsaking of the long-skulls, ancient Helios sought a different route of data storage via genetic coding, recasting their projected future.

The Helios' began coming fully functional by the following day. They had a mission set forth by themselves and the ancient ones to go underground and develop an internal society within Earth to prepare for a distant future. They chose to stay underground during the developmental stages of the human race in the absence of Abaddon. Ancient Helios looked at many-many outcomes of the 21st century, and they are all the same- war, viral outbreaks, and hatred. Only a few modern-day people can resist the adrenal rush of power and anger.

Helios is to breed with a select few of the humans stemming from the blood of Yeshua's children and their children's children. This is all to take place deep within the Earth, around 500-700 miles in depth. A depth so deep it encumbers anyone attempting to locate it.

Before the thousands of Helios and Yeshua's people could begin their excavation, they needed technology and materials. During the thousand-year incubation period, billions of years in the past, Ancient Helios used their interwoven essences to vibrate spacetime and collect various metals and resources from the surrounding asteroid belt that was once the planet they live on. The belt held essential entangled particles left from their Quanyights and other food sources.

They collectively constructed crafts capable of flight within the atmosphere of Earth to carry the goods and materials needed for the group's survival.

Once the group came fully alert the day after their emergence, they began scraping rocks and gravel away from the ground, creating various designs of local animals. The formations needed to be large enough to be seen from the planet's outermost atmosphere. The ships The Helios built remained fixed in LaGrange pockets for hundreds of years until they detected specific symbols on the surface of Earth at Birú.

Once specific designs were scraped out, the ships detected them utilizing a cross-plane scanner. The vessels waited for ages, periodically scanning the surface of Earth until the designs became present on Earth. They distinguished them in the same fashion a phone's camera scans a QR code. They then activated, leaving the balance points between the gravitationally wedged spacetime pivots. Multiple ships then began entering the atmosphere headed to the enormous hieroglyphs of Ancient Nazca. Primitive people all over the globe—again—witnessed an unfathomable event of what they described as flying turtles or smoking carriages that float with the clouds. These sights only amplified their ancestors' stories into fact, sparking untold amounts of faux religions.

32 | Landing Strips

Many thousands of years BCE, after The Helios laid the foundations for their underground avatars, they also utilized scraps of technology from the Hybrid-Anunnaki in order to construct vessels that could carry tools, food, and other supplies to their people upon their hatching.

Once the group finished etching symbols and depictions of earthly life into the desert land of Birú, various vessels of different metallic shades and shapes began to arrive and settle to the ground. Within the ships, Yeshua's followers, and the Helios' found livestock from across the globe, seeds, harvested items such as grains, beans, and rice. They also received the necessary tools to begin digging underground, deep within the Earth. And the technology can be reconstituted to provide an advanced electrically dependent underground civilization.

Instructions were given to shave the top of a specific mountain down for the purpose of landing Earth-regulated craft—additional craft that still wait in the LaGrange pockets. It would take a few hundred years for the Helios' to construct their underground labyrinth—a home they will take up residence in not emerging until—and if even possible—the naturally evolved hominoids of Earth unify together, nullifying war. This is a task that is only likely if people advanced technologically enough to invent substance replicators, control random pregnancies, and let go of the desire for power over others.

For hundreds of years, the Helios' and Yeshua's disciples mined the unnamed region of ancient Peru. Yeshua's people gained limited immortality after sharing the wine of his blood. This allowed them to work with the Helios', going under Earth's crust, closer to the core.

Something of an instinct for the Helios' being accustomed to a stationary life embedded into the crust of Phaeton. As well as the Anunnaki blood's instinct to hollow the planet and invert the surface so that the inner workings are inverted with a sun-like energy generated by the core.

Eventually, a long strip of land became stretched with spiraling openings, leading into their underground city. All the material mined, whether it be dried up dirt turned to dust or precious gems, minerals or metals was converted using an S.R.D.—Substance Replication Device—to create water, explosives, foods, material for 3D printing, and so on. The use of the materials left no waste behind, keeping a clean surface of the land after excavating millions of tons of material. The technology of the Anunnaki mixed with the quantum essence of the ancient Helios gave The Helios the ability to create such technology. The converted remainders of the dig gave the group all they needed to survive for an unmeasured length of time, reaching into the tens of thousands of years.

Helios began an international trading system with surrounding civilizations, bringing about more myths of gods that arrive in golden chariots of fire that trail the sky like a snake made of smoke. Asian cultures called it a fire-breathing dragon; Egyptians referenced them as gods with wings—bird Men. Native Americans described them as “The Birds of Metal that Come from the Thunder.” Ancient India was the only group of evolved Hominoids that described the craft for what they were—alien technology. The encounters helped put the final touches on the book of Ramayana.

Eventually, Helios’ and Yeshua’s people went underground, leaving no evidence of their technology behind, causing ‘The Nazca Lines’ to be one of the great mysteries to modern people. Some think the lines are meant for spiritual journeys. Others believe it is a message to the gods. When, in fact, the drawings were simply landing targets, and the lines were nothing more than the landing strips of thousands of payloads brought back and forth by the ancient Helios.

The Helios’ made sure to close up their spiraled holes before disappearing into the Earth. One would have to dig nearly 10-miles to reach the base of the opening. Somewhere in the middle of the first 2,000 year stretch of the common era, these spiraled openings were converted to store and pump water to surrounding agriculture for crops. A genius repurposing the construct – and done by humans, no less. They rerouted a basin system so that any water delivered to the crops that go unabsorbed by the roots is routed back to the reservoirs to make use of every last drop.

The people of Birú were able to sustain life in the desert wasteland of Nazca for hundreds of years before perishing. These settlers of the region looked to the Nazca lines as a sign that there was a godly intervention that took place there. To them, it was a great honor to be able to reside where the gods once took residence.

Local people started up regular traditions to walk the entire outline of the etched animal art. They would map out each step to draw a viewable version of the artistic works. To them, it was a spiritual journey. If they accurately mapped out the workings of the depiction, it was considered to be a sign of luck and prosperity.

Some of the tribes even began to construct their own drawings in the dirt to try and contact the gods. Their drawings are some of the less accurate and less elaborate of the set of sky viewable pictures of life on Earth.

Ancient Birú was the intersecting point of Earth for trade between the various races and cultures for hundreds of years. The working-class tribes looked to the flying objects as signs of their gods. The leaders of the majority of the world's people were descendants of Yeshua and Abaddon. They were learned in the ancient ways of technology. They quickly became accustomed to the Helios' interest in exchanging food for materials, spices for technology—nonelectrical technology. Helios' did not want the humans to obtain anything that would speed up their evolutionary process. Like all things in the universe, inputting substance—whether it be digital or physical, too quickly—overloads whatever is receiving it.

After Helios' gathered all it needed and disappeared into the earth with Yeshua's followers, the rest of the world was left to go back to the dark ages, beginning the era of Medieval Times.

The only remaining surface evidence of Helios' are the Quimbaya Artifacts, which depict the various spaceships and earthly-atmosphere navigable craft.

33 | Scriptural Documentation

While the Helios' dug underground, Yeshua's people utilized technology given to them by the Ancient Helios to rewrite the historical knowledge and multi-life experiences of Yeshua. They documented all the history on thin sheets of quasi-gold paper—a material that is indestructible to those that do not possess the ability to disconnect matter from the fabric of spacetime—a skillset only a race as ancient as the Helios can utilize. Not even the Anunnaki within the core of Nibiru can comprehend the compositions of weaving matter into space even though their transient DNA is interwoven into the dimensional fabrics of time.

When the ancient Helios, Helios' group came into creation, it generated a second flow of knowledge of the history of Yeshua and the many bodies that it took up residence in. The long-skulled helios hacked up the initially written book. At the same time, the Helios' took every bit of knowledge from Yeshua's people precisely, teaching his followers how to document it on their special gold paper. A metallic book that remains hidden somewhere on the planet out of reach of the Catholic church and other religious cults seeking power over the earthly hominoids.

Since Helios' remained within the planet's inner workings along with the descendants of Yeshua's followers, the truth has yet to be released or found. The re-workings of Yeshua's history altered by the long-skulls remains the historical data that floods society to this day. Once settled and severed from ancient Helios, the long-skulls sought only to indulge in the Earth's bounties and overpower the easily codable human species.

There have been various recorded documents from before the common era of Earth—ancient testimonies of those who came into contact with one or another of Yeshua's resonances. After year zero, modern testimonies began popping up all over the globe. Stories were handed down generation after generation of Yeshua and his words. His murder and the guardians of the sky. Artists painted depictions of what their grandparents' parents' grandparents told them of the event.

Pontius Pilate sentenced Yeshua to his piercing of the limb's death sentence. Although he was not in attendance at the horrific event, the stories he was told of the happening put him in a downward spiral of health, taking him to the afterlife only a few years after the historic event took place.

The servants and militicians who attended the murderous ceremony told him of the shiny shields in the clouds that observed Yeshua's death.

Yeshua was also curious as to what the objects were. It did not recall having sent any of its own technology to the time, and it did not recognize the technology either. One of the vessels hosted what looked to Yeshua like an evolved hominoid dressed in some type of uniform not too dissimilar to his home planet's spacesuits. Only, the lifeforce within the space-drapery was not Anunnaki. A mystery to both the 1st-century people of Earth and the last Anunnaki of the time.

Yeshua's blood gave his followers what they needed to live for a long time, allowing them to thoroughly document the historical records. Yeshua wanted this history to be preserved for the purposed of battling Abaddon in the distant future. It knew that there would be a war on the horizon as Abaddon never had the chance to know the people of Earth the way Yeshua did and does.

When Abaddon became semi-functional as a teenage boy in the early 20th century, his Roman Catholic upbringing confused him. He was taught the twisted words Yeshua never spoke and learned of his life and death. It wouldn't dawn on Abaddon that his religious teachings were of his and Yeshua's history until his resonance fully absorbed the human casing he was in.

When Yeshua and Abaddon began transitioning their resonances via artificial insemination via quantum entanglement, they were unable to be fully aware of their past until the brain fully developed. Part of the reason why they took turns being the other's parent. Only, they had separated with the other thousands of years in the past—before common era—to try and repair the damage their greedy hybrid relatives caused. So, their upbringing and recalibration of historical memories were left for them to reconstruct on their own, upon age.

In the early 1900s, Abaddon began to recall his history and Yeshua's. Only, the teachings of the church conflicted with his historical memory banks. This led him to start seeking out the truth and what really happened the past 2,000-years and if Yeshua is still alive.

In year 0033, Abaddon stayed and observed Yeshua's suffering – without his knowledge – until he was thrust with a spear, and his resonance faded from detection. Abaddon was one of the floating visitors in the sky of Yeshua's execution. Only, he remained out of Yeshua's sight. In the distant future, he views himself etched into paintings that still hang today.

When Abaddon saw himself in a painting of the victimization of the Nazarene, it was like someone turned on the lights of his mind. Everything came rushing back in, and he began to remember his past. He then spent the next decade researching and educating himself on everything Yeshua did and everything he told his followers to do after his death.

Abaddon had to find his way into the basement church of the Vatican to learn the complete truth of the past 2,000-years since he departed. The Catholics had ransacked multiple cultures for 1500-years after Helios' disappeared. They gathered up all scraps of knowledge and cleaned out the Qumran Caves, only overlooking what is now known as the dead sea scrolls.

These documents are the only ones containing the truth as the book of golden papers does. The elongated helios reworked them into the modern concept of biblical depictions for their own personal gain. The catholic church knows the truth, having found Yeshua's followers' only other original documents.

Just as the long-skulls natural instincts of greed and power took over them, so does the need for people to use religion for the same. After all, they are just following their creators' image.

Abaddon used his psychic Anunnaki abilities to manipulate priests into letting him into the library. He then spent the majority of his late teens and twenties with his head buried in ancient scrolls—searching for the sins of Yeshua. He eventually discovered that Yeshua has an entire bloodline branching through history embedded deep within certain groups of Jewish Hebrew descent. It became a mission of Abaddon to exterminate any and all drops of the forsaken blood of Yeshua.

Abaddon wasn't sure; he assumed that the descendants of Yeshua might be capable of recognizing his resonance, which could damper or ruin his plans. So, he laid out the blueprints in 1933 to exterminate any bloodline stemming from a Hebrew ancestry.

34 | The Reptilian Hominoid

Helios' were and still are incapable of breeding—a backfired plan of the ancient ones. It is a questionable query The Helios had. They knew how to create life from organic material, but they never figured out how to make life that can breed when their essence is held within the casings. Oddly, the Anunnaki were able to achieve this with their Hybrids—only, the Hybrids could not produce with each other—that is, they were only able to breed with people, whereas Helios' cannot achieve either.

Helios' tried to breed with Yeshua's followers, but all attempts were unsuccessful. The ancient Helios and Helios' hadn't a clue how long their bodies would survive. It was not of importance to any party whether the Helios' survived; it was only necessary that the knowledge of science and the history of Yeshua be preserved for a time when Humans are capable of seeing each other as a single entity rather than individuals capable of surviving on their own.

Around 0250 common era, Helios' and their Anunnaki-laced counterparts disappeared underground, leaving no trace of their existence except for the drawings only visible from the air. For a few hundred years, their lifestyle and civilization were not dissimilar from modern 21st-century life. Then, a time came when their electrical connection to the quantum realm was severed. This happened on a coupled timewave-0—a double-string of spacetime existing simultaneously. The ancient Helios both reside within the fabric of spacetime and are extinct, leaving only the single Hybrid-Anunnaki Helios to remain. The Helios may live in the past pulled across time; however, the string of time created to do this was only an overlapping stretch of imitation-time that was cut off when Phaeton was ripped from its position wedged in Mars's and Jupiter's gravity—a timeline billions of years old that was shifted to line up with the common era of Earth.

When Phaeton was taken from its natural position, the instance of the occurrence was in sync with the Earth year measured around 0500 common era. The catastrophe altered history, present days, and oncoming days.

There was little to no effect on surface life. They hadn't any electricity or leftover Anunnaki technology; it was all stolen by Helios and taken underground to allow hominoid life 2,000 years of untampered evolution. The event disrupted the quantum electrical grid rendering all electricity-based technology useless—something unnoticed by surface life.

Unfortunately for the underground dwellers, their lights went out, and they were some 50-100 miles deep within the planet with no way out.

The now future stationed Helios' instantly adapted to the underground world where Yeshua's descendant's offspring adapted over time to the blacked-out world, ultimately changing their physical bodies into cold-blooded nocturnal creatures.

The absence of the artificial sunlight turned their eyes from circular to diamond-shaped, allowing them to see in the dark. Intense radioactive heat from Earth's core converted their skin into rugged leather scales, and the lack of cold turned their blood cold. Their children's tailbones began being born with the whole tail to help them navigate the tunnels like a blind person with a walking stick.

The evolutionary process occurred over a thousand years. Once they became fully adapted to their surroundings, they were able to begin constructing new technologies utilizing Earth's natural electrical currents rather than the transient materials—quantum electrical current that became obsolete when the ancient Helios lost their spacetime connection with their severed counterparts.

From 1500 common era to the 1800s, and still continued today, Helios' and their reptilian colleagues reside in a wholly advanced civilization spanning the inner Earth. They created superior underground cities from the sea base to the land of Antarctica 5,000-meters below the ice—a location Abaddon would eventually seek out after learning of the evolved species.

On occasion, in the midst of dark nights, some of the mutated hominoids would come and still come to the surface to inspect the evolution of humans, bringing upon the myths of the ant people and the reptilians or even sasquatch and bigfoot when a Helios' would visit.

Helios, Helios', helios, and the ancient Helios itself is in an unknown controversial battle on many different planes from many different angles crossing many timewaves. To themselves, they are unaware that their severed underground counterparts found peace and sanctuary within the dwellings of the underground Earth.

The earth-encased ones strive to find a way to reconnect with the ancient ones to bring them to Earth, only they don't realize they are already there as their former bodies on Phaeton are scattered across the asteroid belt—dissolved and dead.

The Helios' had no intentions of departing their underground metropolis. The planet's core and adaptive bodies were more than enough to satisfy their life needs.

When they first crawled out of the band of holes, they were hominoid men and women unable to reproduce. This was simply natural due to Earth's frequencies within the 4th-dimensional realm. Over time, they began to shift back into their Phaeton form with no genitalia, mouths, eyes, nose, or any other orifices. They became the organic manikin-looking creatures they once were on Phaeton. This time, the color of their skin turned translucent like a jellyfish. And although they had no pigmentation, their bodies emitted colored glowing light patterns like the deep-sea Rainbow Squids of their home planet.

The beyond great-grandchildren of Yeshua—the now reptilian evolved race of Hominoids—found the evolution of Helios' into translucent bodies and multipatterned-lights quite the spectacle to see with their tetrachromatic eyes. Watching them glow and sparkle helped them evolve a better sense of the surface life colors.

Helios' then instructed the reptilians to begin exploring the surface to find them certain materials to start prepping the evolved humans of the modern era for the transitioning of the ancient Helios if they can—at some point—reconnect with the severed ones on an overlapping timewave where Phaeton may not have been annihilated by the Anunnaki Moon.

35 | Lunar Activity

Lying dormant within the Earth's artificial moon is a plethora of Anunnaki technology. The moon itself and the internal time transmission passage are still intact. This equipment is ancient Anunnaki technology from the present or near future.

The Anunnaki sent the moon to Earth over four billion years ago from the modern era. And, when Abaddon's resonance culminated in his 20th-century casing, the moon activated and alerted the Anunnaki still imprisoned within Nibiru's inner workings. This notification to Nibiru was to be a glorious day for the Anunnaki. Earth was supposed to have been terraformed and morphed into a technologically advanced society prepped for transitioning all the Anunnaki resonance. It is a great disappointment to learn that the group of scientists and the hybrid avatars sent to the distant past failed to complete their missions. They remained unaware that Abaddon was still cultivating a plan to reprogram the people of Earth—a project that won't fulfill for hundreds of years on some timewaves. Whereas on others within the early 21st century.

The earth's evolving people observed the Nibiruian's home planet drifting away from and out of the Milky Way as a sprinkle of fading light cut off from the spiraling galaxy. Before they depart the local galaxy, they will use any last articles of technologies to make their way through the wormhole connecting the moon they stole from Pluto to the metal sphere that satellites Earth.

When Abaddon became completely aware, reinfused with his past knowledge and consciousness, he copiously educated himself. He researched everything he could find about Yeshua's followers' two thousand years of gospel. His investigation was not to become enlightened rather to become educated of any lingering bits of Anunnaki technology and Yeshua's blood.

It then dawned on him that even though most of his ancient ancestor's technology was lost on Earth, there is a nearly unlimited supply within the moon.

Since the earth-evolved hominoids discovered how to mine and contain electricity, Abaddon issued an order to assemble a team of rocket scientists to begin a 'secret mission' to The Moon. They used the ballistics program for long-range missiles as a cover-up for their true purpose. When the United States undercover agents learned of this, they took the liberty of ending the great war and stealing the scientists.

Under his directive, in 1944, Abaddon's most accomplished engineers and physicists developed the blueprints and foundation structure of the Aggregat 4 rocket—a miniature version of what would find its way to the lunar satellite in 1969. This vessel disguised as a missile is truly meant for escaping the atmosphere and navigating to the Moon. Abaddon will become invincible if he can get his resonance within the orbiting sphere. He taught his scientist to develop the technology. He also sent the soldiers on missions to collect materials from across the globe.

Even though the Helios' took all Anunnaki technology underground with them, Abaddon knew of some hidden pieces at the latitude and longitude coordinates of 44.512, 64.295. In 1909, the youngest president ever elected began digging at these coordinates. He assembled a team to excavate a mysterious hole that burrowed the bedrock. At the base of the hole is an entrance. The entrance leads deep within the substratum to an unground tunneling system that extends further into the Earth. No human could ever reach this depth due to the sheer pressure and intense temperatures. Even with advanced technologies, earth-raised hominoids would either melt from the lowering of the boiling point of H₂O or freeze due to the absence of outer and inner heat sources. A clever hiding spot so to prevent any non-Anunnaki from obtaining world-dominating power.

36 | The Andromedites

Having been evolved on Phaeton during the creation of Earth's solar system, the ancient Helios believed they were the first and dominant intelligence of all the universe. Unknown to them, a far superior race stemming from the Andromeda Galaxy had their attention caught by the drawings visible from space in Birú. A fluke, an accident, or perhaps intuitive science landed their transitional optics a front-row seat to the ants scraping away at the soil of pre-Nazca. The sign of intelligent life within the close by Milky Way Galaxy set forth a mission for the advanced race.

Andromeda is more than 2.537 million light-years away from Earth, so the information being viewed by this distant culture is from far-far in the past, long after Earth had become that of its brother planets, Mars and Nibiru—a desolate outer wasteland teeming with underground life.

Helios of all ages never detected the Andromedites because their existence was so far into the future they could never reach them. Even though ancient Helios is connected with the fabric of time stretched from start to end, a distance beyond the end stretches further with time ever-growing to infinity.

As spacetime expands, so does the measurement of the speed of light. However, from the viewpoint of a person within the realm of 4D space, the measurement remains equal to approximately 300 million meters per second. To the fifth dimensional viewer from outside the fourth dimension, the speed of light is ever increasing.

The change in spacetime expands the universe with super accelerating velocities—an alteration unnoticed by those within. This change broadens the timewave like a linked chain growing additional links here and there and everywhere along the chain. Since each link is identical, and the timewave extends to infinity, the detection of the different links goes unnoticed by Helios, allowing other races from other planets to evolve without their consent.

This race of beings millions of light-years away felt the uncontrollable need to connect with the ancient humans of Earth.

They discovered that time is mostly an illusion brought on by light and cellular decay tricks. Time is not something these people keep track of. For them, time was like an empty box. The walls acted as time and contained everything within. Still, one could walk to any part of the room to experience different parts of time. If one wants to be in the future, they just walk forward. If they're going to go to the past, they walk backward.

They saw time for the block of mass that it is. It's like watching a movie in a high-speed forwarding mode—everything is a blur souping together. If one were to flip their vision from moving in space to moving in time, they would see nothing but a solid block of matter with particles bouncing every which way. Because, for example, a human body is constantly moving- sit down, stand up, walk around, and so forth. If viewing from the stretch of time, one wouldn't see the person moving about the timebox; they would see everywhere the person was over this interval, creating a blur accumulation of mass like a container stuffed with cotton. For the Andromeda people, this is how they viewed time.

The people of Andromeda, like most intelligent life, spent their entire 'evolved' existence searching for other intellectually developed species. To their surprise, they discovered what they had been looking for, millions of years in the past. However, the past to them is no different than turning around in a car and heading back to where one started. So, they began a mission to Earth far-far in the past. They want a team of their scientist to observe the beginning, middle, and end of the humanoid evolutionary process. Little to their knowledge, they are about to embark on a journey that will alter their concept of reality.

The Anunnaki, ancient Helios, and Andromedites all hold special knowledge that the others don't, regardless of each culture's state of advancement. They all simply evolved as they were supposed to based on their locations within the realm of fourth-dimensional living.

What the people of Andromeda observed millions of years in the future is not what the outcome of Earth will be now that they have found themselves relocated to the start. When they arrived at the 3rd or 4th rock from the sun—depending, they discovered planet Theia and observed the creation of the jagged pre-moon. They then observed as the scenario reset itself, watching the Anunnaki mooncraft send Theia into the sun and take its place as Earth's mooned satellite.

These events confused the Andromedites as their understanding of time was as a single event. The happenings taught them that they were not as worldly as they thought. Even with all their history and knowledge of the universe, they hadn't really understood the construct of timewaves. Cumulatively, neither does The Helios nor Anunnaki. Only one person—an Earth-born human—understands the five timewaves plus one. And his experiments are what give the human race a leg up on the never-ending battle for the use of their bodies as avatars.

37 | 4.5 Billion Years BCE

At the center of pre-Earth's solar nebula, amid scattered rocks and space dust, a disc-shaped craft unzips the vacuum of time. It then glides into the chaotic frameworks of the forming galaxy as it exits the portal like a sock being pulled from a foot, leaving its passageway to permanently close behind it. Shortly after, the flat saucer-shaped object enters the scattered pebbles of fluctuating quantum matter and non-quantum mass. It moves with an oscillating surface that matches the frequencies of whatever touches it, allowing any object that makes contact to pass through the ship without damage.

Before maneuvering outward of the debris field, the operators make a note of their exit coordinates, coordinates that will eventually become the core of the soon-to-be primitive star of future Earth.

2.5 million light-years in the distance, spanning from the center of the preformed Milky Way Galaxy to the center of a twin spiral, another Earth-like world is assembling itself. This mirror reflection of the starry milked laced sky simultaneously emerged as clusters of gas and dust formed the counterpoised luminaries.

The heavenly body's center is a core of quasi-duel-entangled-quarks or quadenqs—a sub-subatomic elementary particle at the heart of all the universe's stars. This gathering of invisible molecules connects with other massive gas balls like flowing electrons through copper wire. Eventually, these gigantic spheres of gas collapse on themselves, leaving nothing more than a gaping wormhole connected to the next star. It is dangerous to travel as one may land within the core of a star and burn up instantly or never find their way home as each entrance only has an exit.

Use of a sun for spacetime jumping is safe to enter but not safe to exit unless the sun is still within its solar nebula stage of a collapsed star-forming a black hole. The gravitational force generated by the black hole is far greater than the speed of light, and its creation bends time so that when it becomes present, it has always been present.

When exiting a spacetime jump into a black hole, the piloted craft must warp its surrounding median to avoid the suction of gravitational forces. This powerful force is generated by super condensed matter. If the surrounding norm is not curved about the craft, it, and everything within becomes one with the consolidated particles of the space drain.

The ones living within the Perseus family of constellations learned over their extended existence that the core of their Sol lands them within the Milky Way. And that Earth's Sol returns them to a nearby solar system—a system with a forming star still in its solar nebula stage. They can then travel for a few light years from this coordinate to return home.

The people of Perseus—known as the Andromedites from Andromeda—had to travel to the end of time to reach the past. It is not possible to go backward in time. And it is not possible to time travel to the future—that is, they can simply accelerate themselves through time to reach the end of time, where they can then enter the beginning of time and accelerate to the past.

Long before the solar nebula of Earth's Sol in the Milky Way Galaxy collapsed on itself, becoming a protostar with no nuclear fusion, the Andromedites delivered a probe to satellite the forming system of planets that will whirl about the future yellow dwarf. Their craft observes the timewave collecting data for four billion five hundred two million five hundred thousand years.

The instant they launched their craft, the multi-billion years of collected data came fluttering into their computing systems, giving them all the knowledge they needed from the surrounding stars and black holes to safely navigate the Milky Way Galaxy.

When they received this information, Earth had already long gone the way of Mars—a deserted desert wasteland encasing an unseen underworld of intelligent life. However, wormholes in stars don't just connect space but also time. One may not be able to travel through time—past or forward—but they can land in different quadrants of spacetime.

Spacetime interweaving is similar to a fifth-dimensional torus where the volume is space, and the surface is time. A traveler can simply exit space at any point of the time surface to land within said time. This movement does not allow one to alter history as their presence is part of the geometry of spacetime. This is how the Andromedites learned of the method. When they were, searching the stars and viewing lights projected to their telescope lenses from millions of light-years in the past, they saw themselves. Upon learning this, they began to understand the universe's true nature.

After they spent many Andromeda years researching the history of the Milky Way, they set forth their mission to send a team to the Earth's space region for observation of the alien lifeforms. They landed on the planet just before the Anunnaki hybrids became aware. They had already seen the layout of the history of Humankind, both natural and unnatural, so they sought out a location on Earth that would be out of reach and unnoticed by the residents of the planet. This location has the current coordinates of 16.46 degrees south and 68.68 degrees west.

Before settling in this area, they had to build structures capable of mounting their vessels. As well as to cater to their comforts during their stay upon the soil of Earth. They named their new home after—what people of Earth would consider being a capital—Pumoria Punkinia. They called it Pumapunku for short. Or at least, that is what the natives of Earth would come to know it as via translation.

The construct of their new residence was mostly made up of andesite and red sandstone. Scout ships were sent to elevated areas far out of sight of the intelligent life on Earth to gather materials. They quarried stone using quantum laser molecular distractors and then transported the monolithic stones with antigravitational magnetic repulsion.

Within a few weeks, they built and completed their monumental city. Much of the craftsmanship was carving out interlocking designs within the stones to mount or launch their vessels from. Each landing platform is unique to the type of craft brought down from the sky.

When Earth's gravity dominates, the dense stone mainstays are needed to keep their ships from floating into space. Their vessels are designed to oppose all gravitational forces in the universe. When they are not actively moving through warped spacetime, the ships get caught in the spacetime current and drift off like an abandoned raft on a river. So, they needed the stone pillars to be heavy enough to counteract the gravitational repulsion while they resided on Earth.

38 | Landing

Like Legos, the interlocking monolithic structures of Pumapunku have many uses when shifted and connected with the others. One use is a runway for launching their atmosphere-designed vessels; other uses are molds for molting metallics and stones into various designs to imitate their lifestyles back in Andromeda. Or to build more airborne crafts intended for navigating atmospheric conditions of the planet for scavenging and observing the evolved and evolving life.

The first stones carved were cut to land a craft carrying the Andromedite team members. A part of the group went to the surface without a vessel, utilizing bodysuits. These air-gliders landed first so they could prep the massive stones for the primary ship's landing. The ship carried all the necessary tools to prepare for further transportation, other materials, and Earth navigable vessels.

When the craftless team came to the planet's surface, they base-jumped from their ship from the lowest part of the troposphere utilizing aviator suits. They flew from the sky looking like winged humans bringing about the first myths of angels and more legends of the guardians of the sky who could fly.

Primitive tribes across the lands witnessed the winged humans glide through the sky as they navigated to their destination at Tiwanaku. Fortunately for the Andromedites, the Hybrid-Anunnaki were far too engulfed in their own edifices to pay attention to the fathoms of their outdoor slave people's cries of angels in the sky.

Shortly after making contact at Puma Punku, the Andromedites began relocating sandstone and andesite to build their first landing platform. A task that takes no more than a few days to complete.

They first took a few large pieces of sandstone from a distant crag and transported them to their new base. They then shaped them into identical rectangles with angles of near-perfect precision. Next, they etched in replicated shapes of which each level decreases. The layers dip inward and underneath the other so to provide a locking mechanism when the ship's landing gear expands into it. The cutouts mimic a shrinking trapezoidal staircase with depressions leading into the next. So, when the ship's feet slip in and dilate, they lock in like a key holding the vessel in place.

Once the ships landed and locked in, they built more tools and mined materials across the planet, allowing the Andromedites to fashion more structures and have a more comfortable and modern lifestyle.

After they finalized their new home made of stone, the mother ship departed Earth's balancing points. It then took up residence as a satellite of Venus. Their primary craft goes undetected even today. It acts as a miniature cloaked moon to the planet, only detectable by the gassy tides on the surface, which are—to present-day—mistaken by astronomers as windstorms. The ship waits for eternity, lost and invisible to the Earth-human's eye.

At the center of ancient Puma Punku, an andesite construct is built as an ode to the people of Earth. The Alien visitors embedded carved depictions of each hominoid species spanning one hundred and fifty thousand years. Within the square dugout stadium, the walls are lined with the faces of Africans, Asians, Indians, Native Americans, Europeans, Hobbits, Hybrids, Apes, Reptilian-Hominoids, and all other derivations of the mutated people of Earth.

The Andromedites lived peacefully at Puma Punku for the duration of the evolution of humankind and all the plotting and scheming of Helios and the Anunnaki. On occasion, they would interfere with The Helios of all timewaves coming to the people as angels. Helios had no knowledge of their existence, and the Andromedites were careful to avoid the long-skulls and young Helios as well as the Nazca-born Helios'. They only interacted with unaffected humans of natural evolution.

The people of Andromeda helped many primitive tribes across the globe. Tribes deep within rainforests or at distant lands and islands out of reach of the Anunnaki and ancient Helios. They helped these people understand life and guided them along their spiritual journeys.

They mostly visited remote tribes deep within jungles and rainforests as these people grew from the planet naturally without any interference from extraterrestrial bits of intelligence. There were small pockets of people that ancient Helios and the Anunnaki hadn't any knowledge of. They thought that their slave creations using lab-altered genetics were the only intelligence on Earth.

The ultimate interbreeding of the naturally evolved and the slave-developed persons helped branch two sets of modern hominoids- humans and people – the intelligent animal and the spiritual being.

The Andromedites taught these isolated tribes' language, basic arithmetic, and building techniques. They also used their technology to isolate all edible plants for substance and medicinal use. They had a machine that looked similar to a human-robot. The machine had a glass stomach and was programmed to consume, track and document every individual plant within the radii of the various tribes. The Andromedites would then download the knowledge to themselves and teach the people so that they may enrich their lives.

After, they departed, never to return, leaving the primitive people to believe they were gods. This sparked many religions all over the planet. Despite the tribe's different worship rituals, they all have one thing in common- their gods came from the same constellation: The Andromeda Constellation.

39 | Mission- Observe

2.5 million years into the future, at the center of Messier 110— orbiting the spiraling stars of the Andromeda galaxy—an artificial satellite winding about detects a distant planet teeming with life. It then signals the home base. This notification was as unexpected to the group of scientists receiving it as if a cat gave birth to a dog. Data began flooding their computing systems, telling them of Earth's natural life. The information sends the people of Andromeda on a mission. They wish to visit the mysterious planet wedged deep in the Milky Way Galaxy, circling a brilliant star cut from the same entangled gassy particles as the Messier 110.

Messier 110 is a dwarf elliptical galaxy, a satellite of the Andromeda Galaxy in the Local Group Galaxies. It collects a series of planets so similar to Earth's brothers, and sister's that one looking in may not realize they are viewing an antique mirror reflection of Earth's solar system. The planetary alignment is nearly identical; only planet Theia remains in their arrangement.

Deep inside this distant solar system, a yellow dwarf sun harbors two opposing planets that whip and whirl past each other each year within its Goldilocks region. Like Earth, Theia went in the opposite direction—a clockwise motion opposing the natural counter-clockwise movement that all the planets have. For Messier 110, Theia moves counterclockwise, and the remaining planets move clockwise. Just the opposite of Earth's heavenly partners.

At this location in the universe, the mirror reflection—twin solar system still has all its original 12 planets. Of course, they evolved quite differently than Earth's 12 planets. Phaeton is still wedged between the reversed Jupiter and Mars; Nibiru has an elongated orbit but is still detectable with basic telescope technology. No life ever evolved on Phaeton-110 because none of the dual-entangle sub-subatomic particles found their way to the planet during its creation as it did on Earth's Phaeton. Theia, being the most important planet of Messier 110, stays on a semicircular parallel path with Earth-110. The two worlds never collided or separated because no Anunnaki interference took place.

Earth-110 and Theia-110 act as Moons to the other. On Earth, before the Anunnaki sent the false moon-craft, Theia and Earth's collision was what made the original jagged un-uniform moon. In the Messier-110 solar system, the two planets' gravitational forces impact each other twice per year as they pass by each other.

As Theia-110 flies past Earth-110 and Earth floats past Theia, the expansion of spacetime pushes the massive oceans down and up, causing super title waves that soak a fourth of the planet for weeks on end for one part of the year. On the other pass by, the planets are cold and frozen. So, the gravitational forces create friction between the tectonic plates due to the pressure of the ice being pushed or pulled away from the planets' surfaces. This then causes earthquakes and other natural disasters to occur.

A somewhat disasters sounding place to live but actually, these catastrophes are what make the planets so livable.

Half of each world's surface remains too dangerous to live on. The after-effects such as molting lava and flowing water, help grow their continents larger and provide more fuel sources with each passing.

Two different types of intelligence evolved on these planets of the Messier-110. For billions of years, two hominoid races worked their way from the scum of the ocean to the brilliance of the drylands.

Eventually, the two races learned of one another. They then evolved to the level of space travel so to encounter each other. During the beginning of their newly found relations—like all races—they quarreled over concepts such as religion, life after death, and other thoughts with no evidence or proof of fact.

During the Andromedites early developmental stages, there was war and slavery, just as any suitable hominoid species aspire to. Like all evolved species, they came to learn the true nature of existence. They began interbreeding, ultimately fusing into a single purebred race stemming from two different breeds. The planets became as connected sociably as future Earth is with its continents. Each person on Earth-110 contains the genetics from each race, and there are no leaders, only guidance and compliance.

When the Andromedites, in their fully evolved and unified state, came to learn of their twin solar system, they knew they needed to come together and breed with the humans of Earth to further their existence within fourth-dimensional space. So, they set out on their mission to observe the species from the start so they may know exactly what time in space is the best time to begin the interbreeding sequence. This process does not require sexual intercourse. The Andromedites evolved away from nature's way of generating intoxicating effects within the mind for the purpose of manipulation in order to keep animals breeding against their better judgment.

Like the ancient Helios and the Helios' of Earth's underworld, the Andromedites eventually lost their ability to breed via intercourse turning into a single hermaphroditic race that creates newborns via genetic harvest within a lab.

When they learned of the humans and their ability to still have traditional sex, many Andromedites became curious. As part of the team's mission for the ones sent to the future-past at Earth's Pumapunka location, they were to create a new version of themselves using human genetics for the ability of traditional intercourse to begin creating the next generation of Andromedites.

Part of the Puma Punku museum of carved faces of the world is an ode to the genetics of each species of Earth that is now intertwined with the next generation of Andromedites—a mirror entangled species of itself.

40 | Ancient Battles

Somewhere along the Earth timeline, lost to history, the visiting Andromedites stationed at the ancient site of Puma Punku, during its prosperous existence, were on the verge of a great battle. The upcoming conflict would hit them by surprise. Their beautifully sculpted city littered with anchored spaceships and craft would soon become a scattered pile of useless stones.

Along with their mission on Earth, without their awareness, rulers of an ancient land became aware of the Andromedites and their projects to genetically alter the intelligent life of Earth. This angered them as they knew it would hinder their ability to keep the evolved hominoids programmed to do their bidding without question. These ancient ones became known as Asuras and the Andromedites, Devas.

At the peak of conflict, the Asura and Devas entered into an air battle that would change the course of history in Bharat—ancient India. This battle led to the destruction of Pumapunku and nuclear fallout.

The Andromedites spent thousands of years in their high-altitude laboratory, modifying the people and animals of Earth to be better suited for long-term evolution. They abducted many humans from many races and harvested their blood and organs. They were unaware that the Hybrids and long-skulls were of extraterrestrial origin. In contrast, the Hybrids knew that the Asuras were not of Earth.

The Hybrid-Anunnaki long ago anointed themselves the rulers of the universe. At this time, only a few of the tall blue females remained—the ones that chose not to transfer into the human bodies as the rest of the surviving hybrids did.

These few remaining hybrid females fled their counterparts to Bharat to start their own civilization away from their lust-seeking relatives. They started the various Indian and Hindu religions. They brought the primitive people into the culture, teaching them the world of spice and vegetation.

There were four female hybrid-Anunnaki that relocated and stayed within this new Bharat civilization. These four blue females turned into the legend of the eight-arm god Shiva. The multi-limbed blue goddess got her mythological origins from the group posing as a single person. The women took turns ruling while the others regenerated themselves. Every 10-years, they rotated. This brought suspicion to the servants and slaves as to if the blue goddess was the same person each time.

Over the years, talk of the four different faces of Shiva was spread amongst the people, thus bringing rise to the octopi of hands Shiva had.

Shiva ruled during a stretch of time when Abaddon and Yeshua were not present. This was the time between their deliverance of the Hybrids to their initial return after they all had gone extinct except for the young Helios, who lays hidden somewhere in long-term rest.

The Shiva's were left to be the sole survivors of the Hybrids for many hundreds of years. The four females learned that their bodies withstood the test of Earthly time better than the males. And the other Hybrids had all mostly died off after transitioning into animal bodies. It was a fun experiment for the adrenaline-deprived aliens; however, once their resonance was riding an animal's brain, most became locked in a perpetual state of instinct, leading to obsessive-compulsive eating and sexual disorders. Most of them had to be put down.

The people of the time thought that the animals had been possessed by demons, bringing about ritualistic slaughtering. Whenever they slaughtered one of the hybrid-animal transfers, the still ruling blue Anunnaki-Hybrids would come to visit and pay their respects. They would bring food and water to the people to help to honor their brothers and sisters of Nibiru. Ceremonies that turned into a tradition for the evolved hominoids of Earth. Whenever they experienced drought or destroyed harvest, they would slaughter an animal, hoping that the gods would return to provide them with nourishment.

During one of the executions, the observing Andromedites visited using their antigravity crafts. This was when they learned of the alien race ruling over Earth. The knowledge upset them greatly, knowing that the innocent people of the planet had been and still were under the rain of a non-native race. For the people of Andromeda, influencing another culture for their own benefit is an eternal crime. So, they sought to end the Hybrid slave drivers once and for all.

There was something strange in the air that day – some tens of thousands of years ago – when a cylindrical beam of translucent purple plasma shot from a cloud, cutting a hole right through it, leaving a fluffy white donut in the sky behind it. The beam flew through the air, accelerated by the atmosphere, sending it just a tad faster than the speed of light.

Those observing saw the light hit the target before it shot through the cloud. Then, it flew through the sky to hit the cloud, reversing the already begun destruction to an untampered state and then back to destruction. As Einstein predicted, a jump faster than light would shift said thing into the future. Unlike mass, light can break the laws of 4D physics and travel faster than light when put through respective medians.

The Andromedites were unaware that there were four Shiva in total. They thought it was only the one that they observed at the slaughtering. Their laser light weapon struck her throne as she sat upon it, disintegrating her and the majority of her palace.

The Andromedites then returned to Pumapunku, believing that they had rid the world of the dominant extraterrestrials. They did not realize that Shiva's sisters would soon awake from their sleep and set forth an all-out attack on the people of the ancient Tiwanaku Site.

Unannounced, on a day as normal as any other, transient nanobeams of light-fused metallics rained from the sky, piercing holes through the bodies of the Andromeda natives. Miniature atom bombs fell like golf ball-sized hail to the Puma Punku site blasting the multi-ton megaliths across the land like an angry child kicking a toy house.

The vessels stationed within the stone anchors were severed. They flew off into space, propelling like a magnet until they found equilibrium positions amid the solar system.

Nearly half the people died instantly; the other half were able to make it to the crafts designed for atmospheric flight to fight the Shivas. These ships hadn't any weapons, so their only hope for survival was to try and knock the Shivas down, but they fled back to Bharat when they saw the Andromedites take off in flight. They were not aware that the crafts were weaponless.

The Andromedites followed them back to their palace, and a great battle in the sky took place. The slave people described it as chariots of fire dancing in the stadium of the sky until death sprinkled the land, freeing them from the shackles of slavery.

The noninvasive technology that remained for the Andromedites was not enough to stop the Shivas, but the ships all contained nuclear reactors. It was a short battle lasting only minutes.

One of the Shiva's made a direct hit igniting a nuclear reaction equivalent to the bomb on Hiroshima, killing off themselves and most of the Andromedites. Fortunately, the blast was high in the sky, leaving the land mostly untouched. However, nuclear fallout hit many people. It grazed the ground's surface where the battle in the sky took place, leaving it looking like a freshly smoothed ice-skating rink made of radioactive glass.

41 | Reminiscence

Like all ancient monolithic cities, eventually, evolved hominoids found them. When they came across these ancient metropolises, they took it as signs from higher powers to take up residence within them. The aliens that built the monolithic sites hadn't any reason to document the events of their existence. It would be like occupants of the Empire State Building jotting down hieroglyphs of their day-to-day routine for foraging wildlife to come across when they seize to exist. Essentially, all written or documented drawings at ancient sites have nothing to do with the builders or original inhabitants.

At the "Gate of the Puma Punku" near the year 546 common era, a group of settlers established the scattered ruins as a place of holy worship. They came to believe that the location of Puma Punku was and is the center of the universe where all life was created. The colosseum of carved skulls of each race of Earth at Tiwanaku made them believe that the creator gods resided within the area during the formation of all life.

To these uneducated people, the massive stones could only have been transported and built by giants from another world. They hadn't any concepts of electricity or technology, so naturally, the humans' inability to accept answerless solutions brought them to the conclusion that divine magic was in use.

They did not choose to live in the area due to the high altitude and low oxygen atmosphere. People only stayed close by and would journey to Pumapunku for spiritual gatherings.

Many believe that the monolithic stones are portals to other dimensions or ways to speak to the gods. When in fact, they were just anchors, launching pads, and molds. Many local people spent days and sometimes months meditating within the city surrounded by the massive stones, trying to make contact with that which does not exist. These pointless traditions are still carried on today by many of the hominoids stemming from natural and unnatural evolution.

An incredible machine the human mind is. Even with no possibility of reaching or communicating with fabricated concepts, it still produces convincing enough experiences brought on by endorphin to convince people, even to this day, that they are immortal and will live beyond death. Or they are in direct contact with some deity that does not exist. An incredible form of self-manipulation often mistaken for being saved or blessed when it is more along the lines of a mild form of schizophrenia.

Tens of thousands of years after Shiva and the other Hybrids died off, while Abaddon and Yeshua were traveling close to the speed of light, people across the globe began making the ancient alien ruins their homes. In Egypt, the people simply kept the Anunnaki traditions alive. In other parts of the world, such as Maya, the people took over the structures and made them their own. They learned and taught themselves language and mathematics utilizing astronomical calendars and other scraps of planetary documentation left behind.

There is much confusion about the origins of these structures, going back hundreds and thousands of years. The original creators did not etch any data into them; only the human settlers did this. The naive and primitive people of Earth unanimously—without knowing the others—came to believe that these structures were built by giants. Their use of the word does not imply “large.” It was the only word in their vocabulary to describe something greater than themselves.

Stories are passed down from generation to generation by those who had lived with the gods. They learned how their ancestors watched the Shivas, Abaddon, Yeshua, and others hibernate in regenerative sarcophagi. Stories about horses that flew or snakes of fire and smoke in the sky became religious foundations of their cultures. Some skillsets in carving and masonry taught to the former slave race were also passed down and kept alive. After the extraterrestrials all but disappeared, these peoples kept them in history by creating statues or carvings depicting their mystic ways.

42 | Before They Left

When the Anunnaki-Hybrids learned of the Andromedites and their tower on the mountain, they became infuriated and went to war. This war is documented in the Vedic literature, one of the few writings of the original, Holy Bible that remained untampered with over the years. However, it is kept far from the reach of the modern non-Hindu cultures such as European descent, Asians, Hispanics, and Africans. Leaders of the world prevent the truth from reaching the masses to maintain the Helios-Anunnaki programming embedded within every person on Earth.

The battle didn't last long; the Anunnaki demolished Pumapunku, scattering the megalithic Legos twelve thousand feet in circumference, but they were quickly killed off as they were unprepared for the advanced technology of the extraterrestrial visitors. After, the surviving Andromedites took the Anunnaki technology from the blue-skinned corpses. They stored it in a protective box lined with transient gold to prevent the people of Earth from destroying each other. Two duplicate boxes were built: one to hold the nuclear reactor and the other as a decoy.

Over the years, both boxes traveled the globe in the hands of monks and slaves. It was forbidden to open the box as it would kill anyone within a certain radius. Exposure to nuclear radiation was explained as a divine intervention of death to those who broke the holy laws and opened the golden case.

A few of the Andromedites kept a close watch on the non-decoy. They stayed hidden at Mount Sinai for 40-years while a runaway group of Hebrew slaves kept it safe. In exchange, they provided them with food and water via their deep space travel mechanisms for algae accumulation—a dense source of energy-containing everything the human body needs for health and energy. They called it Manna.

While the nuclear reactor was being protected, a few other Andromedites relocated to a set of two small islands outside the Northern Americas. They used what little technology they had left after the war to hollow out the bedrock and create a vault hundreds of feet below the soil. Many think this island is booby-trapped with failsafe mechanisms to keep treasure hunters at bay. In all actuality, there is no treasure. The so-called hydraulics within the island, pumping water to flood passageways, is part of the overall machine built out of the island to keep the alien technology from activating. The device is effectively useless when submerged in water and deep underground.

Abaddon knows of this weapon and its potential as an energy source. He discovered what it was, after, he learned of the ancient history of Vedic literature and the connection to the Arc of The Covenant; he seeks the arc, and without his knowledge, so does Yeshua's long reincarnated resonance. The race to obtain this last remaining piece of Anunnaki technology became the highlight of all governmental powers during the early 1900s.

President Roosevelt found the arc on a treasure-hunting expedition at these islands. He put it in a secured storage facility and kept the truth of the treasure hunt a lie, leaving many other parties to waste millions of dollars and years of their lives trying to uncover nothing.

Yeshua eventually finds his way to the Arc when Albert Einstein joins the fight in WWII. He knew of this technology and contacted the U.S.A. to utilize it to help defeat Abaddon. On August 6, 1945, a rebuild of the ancient atomic technology was dropped at 34.40 degrees North, 132.45 degrees East, putting an end to Abaddon's rain. Months before the bombing, on April 30, 1945, Abaddon left his casing and entered into another bloodline—a bloodline of wealth, power, and trust. He then found his way to America as a Jewish refugee to seek out this new bloodline.

The war ended on September 2, 1945, but this was not the end—only a break until Abaddon could return to power in a different setting. A setting that places him in such control that any defiance of his will would mean hate and ridicule from the surrounding societies.

His second wave of mass human programming began in 2017 common era when he and a team of scientists released a virus into the atmosphere, targeting specific DNA strands to again attempt to wipe out Yeshua's bloodline. The infections were kept secret from the world until they spread to enough people that stopping the spread was impossible.

At this time, they then announced the virus to the world, leading to a universal shutdown that allowed authorities to gain absolute power over the people via mass hysteria brainwashing.

Once they implemented their international communist approach to controlling everyone, all the people of Earth became bound by light waves emitted from their devices' screens. Simple light waves coming from electrically dependent gadgets instantly force groups of humans to bend to the will of the source.

The worldwide viral outbreak strategy programmed all people to take absolute faith in anything they hear, see, or read without any proof or evidence, just so long as the data is delivered artificially. For example, a reporter with no education can say on TV, "Wearing masks stops viruses from spreading." without offering any facts—just an assumption based on a lack of common sense. However, people are programmed to believe it. They no longer have control over their ability to understand actual science; they can only believe what they are told via light waves emitted from technology.

Words coming from another person's mouth in an in-person setting have been programmed to be interpreted as lies. People can now only believe what is delivered to their brains coming from electronically emitted light waves from some device to their eyes or sound waves to their ears. Any natural sources are instantly interpreted as lies leaving the authorities to be the only ones that can tell the world what they want them to believe.

43 | The Dig

Contrary to popular belief, a treasure was never buried on the formerly separated islands now known as the single island, Oak Island. It was actually a deep-sea excavation within and beneath the bedrock supporting the islands. The southeastern portion of this small landmass is comprised of Mississippian Windsor Group limestone and gypsum, and the northwestern part is Cambro-Ordovician Halifax Formation slate. The two variations of bedrock between the islands were chosen to provide a surface layer of protection to prevent radioactive waves from reaching life on the surface.

Windsor limestone is an effective material for blocking radiation. Putting the device underneath the bedrock would help protect surface life from the dangerous radiation waves being emitted by the alien apparatus. The care of this device was left to the Andromedites after the botched attempt to destroy them by the Anunnaki.

The extraterrestrial device was left in the care of some 600,000 trusted men and women as the Andromedites constructed their undersea labyrinth. One of the Andromedites stayed behind, perched atop Mount Sinai, to watch over and guide the people into modern society as they protected this sacred relic. From time to time, Yeshua would visit this off-planet being, never revealing his true Anunnaki resonance.

Yeshua had taken up again as a savor-profit hiding under the radar of Abaddon. He also wanted to see the people of Earth grow into a civilized culture. So, he worked with the lone Andromedite, helping to fine-tune rules and commandments to help set forth a well-adjusted and equal society.

These chosen men and women watched over it for nearly 40 years while stuck in a winding desert with no escape. A pathway designed by the Andromedites so that no one could leave with the device or find the device. The Andromedites created a maze without an exit for this seemingly cursed group of people. When, in all actuality, they were simply assigned to protect the device and needed to be diverted from society until the Andromedites could secure a safe location to hide it from Humankind.

During this 40-year desert stay, the watchers of the Arc worked diligently to find the appropriate hiding place for its technology. This location would need to be chosen so that no one can ever locate the weapon. However, it should still be accessible if required, for whoever holds it has the key to the power over the people.

With what little technology the Andromedites had left over after their brief battle with the Shivas, they were able to find an isolated group of islands on the coast of ancient Canada. Two specific islands stood out to them, being made of different bedrock but close enough together to utilize the space between the islands.

The Andromedites spent decades converting the two small islands of different foundations into a machine to protect the device and any other valuable technology they had or were left behind by other ancient visitors. Besides the makeup of the foundations, the two islands were chosen due to the liquid isthmus between them.

The first thing they did was use antigravitational devices to relocate large quarried stones to barricade each end of the dividing water between the islands. They then needed to drain the contained seawater from the blocked-off area. They did this by using large quantities of flattened potassium metal. This alkali metal reacts violently when exposed to water, generating large amounts of hydrogen and oxygen, effectively removing the water by turning it into various gasses.

Once the water was cleared from the area, they began removing all the sandy flooring of the former ocean cut-off. This was not such an easy task and took many years. At each level they removed, they had to add more megalithic stones to keep water from entering the area. They used the same techniques found in the architecture of Sacsayhuaman, Peru. The perfectly molded stones fuse together to create an airtight seal, thus preventing any water from entering the area.

Eventually, they reached the bedrock. Within the bedrock, the Andromedites burrowed tunnels and holes using the techniques found at the site of Derinkuyu, Cappadocia, Turkey. These passageways were created by using an antimatter molecular separator. To use machines or hand tools for such a task would be too disruptive to the natural formations of the rocks. The A.M.S. analyses all the nooks and crannies of the material it intends to burrow. It, then, sprays out the antimatter particle separation material—a material that has no presence in modern science. It is first spread along the rocks, and then a machine acts similar to a modern 3D printer's arm shooting back and forth – up and down to activate the material.

Once the pattern had been formed, it began turning the matter of the rocks into antimatter, disappearing it from existence. This is why there are never any quarry disposal sites where various ancient structures have been dug or carved out. That is because all the matter was turned to antimatter.

After many more years of slowly digging with their A.M.S. device, deep within the Earth, nearing many miles below the bedrock, the Andromedites hid the precious device. They left passageways open so that if they ever needed to retrieve the nuclear reactor, they could. However, they wanted no traces of the location of this object to be discovered.

They needed to keep the formerly separated islands looking like a single island so no one could find the openings within the split. To do this, they created tunnels through the two islands that act as a hydraulic system pumping out water. The purpose of this system is to keep water from corroding the soon-to-be-connected islands.

After completing this task, they knocked over the thousands of monolithic stones, leaving the initial stones in place to keep water at bay. Then they relocated similar soils from both sides of the island to fill the void.

From within the bedrock, they burrowed out a final exit that would allow an additional entrance in case they needed future access.

This 90-foot hole was layered with local oak logs, foreign coconut husk, and various stones and cement. Each layer was created to prevent the spot from caving in as they dug upward.

They measured 10 feet per layer due to the average height of Andromedites.

When they surfaced, they finalized the dug-up areas around the now singular island with various plants and trees and waited until the islands looked unified. They then returned to Pithom after nearly 40 years to free the now two million people, but there was a problem, these chosen people they wished to protect that were once beautiful had turned into a society of deranged, sexually addicted people fornicating with both sexes of all mature ages.

Before they would free these people, they needed to teach them various commandments of culture so they could live within the intricacies of societies. This task was left to Yeshua when the lone Andromedite departed with the Arc to deliver it to the others. But they lost faith in him without the backing of Mount Sinai. It wasn't until the Andromedites returned and offered to release the people that they curbed their animalistic instincts.

44 | 90-Foot Hole

The inner workings of the mysterious Oak Island were never supposed to be discovered. However, due to seismic activities, the soil had slowly been shaken loose over time, creating depressions where any of the entrances or exits were dug out. The vibrations of the seabed also vibrated the nuclear reactor. This occurrence caused a glowing light to form above the island near the entrance, which was the final exit of the Andromedites.

As this glow occurred, three young men happened to be fishing nearby when they noticed the light. They went on to explore it quickly, coming across a slight depression of soil next to an oak tree. It didn't look like much, but it was clearly unnatural. So, they decided to dig.

When they began searching, it became even more evident that the hole was not natural, as the soil had been blended with various rocks and stones to help prevent such a loosening of the earth. The three young men dug and dug and dug, returning in secret for years to excavate the hole. They would come across some oak logs and coconut fiber every ten feet. Eventually, they reached 90 feet, and at this time, they discovered a stone with strange writings. To them, it looked like something possibly from the Egyptian or Arabic language, but the symbols were not actual language; instead, a password to unlock the door below it. Like anyone trying to keep something safe, they usually use a combination or a key. The Andromedites did the same.

Had the boys known what they were doing, they would have left the stone in place and noticed the alien technology surrounding the base of the cylindrical cavity. They could use the password to open the doorway but instead chose to remove the stone and keep digging.

When the Andromedites constructed this exit, they did not account for anyone digging below the entrance point. So, when the young lads removed the stone and kept digging, a sudden rush of water began flooding the hole. The hydraulic system used to keep moisture away from the artificial connecting strip of land began filling it, hiding the alien entrance from view.

This event led to the boys reaching out to corporations and treasure hunters to feed the need to know what was down below. For hundreds of more years, groups from all over the world from all fields of labor invested their money to attempt to locate the imaginary treasure of Oak Island. They ripped and tore the island to shreds, demolishing almost everything that could have led them to the Arc.

There is much confusion about specific placements of monolithic stones, survey markers, and an unnatural swamp that formed once the boys released the rock and disrupted the water pumping from where the islands were once separated. There are as many theories about the island as there are oak trees upon it – none of them true.

The only truth about the Island is the visitation of the last remaining Knights Templar monks who left Paris before the genocide of their brothers began. They had learned through whispers and old scrolls of the location of the sacred Arc and went on to try and find it. They found the mysterious Oak Island they were told about during their journeys. They immediately surveyed, scoured, and mapped it and its neighboring islands. They searched for anything they could try and get to the treasure. For the knights, the information given to them was thought to be of divine intervention, which was their only hope to save their faith and brothers. After many years and most of them dying off, two men were able to make their way under the island through one of the entrances on a neighboring island. Unfortunately, they were too old and nutrient-depleted to survive the trip. They died thousands of feet below the surface, only to be remembered as a few fragments of calcium hundreds of years later. Their corpses turned to bones amid the winds of an underground ocean's tide.

The Knights Templar never saw the glowing light. However, long before the boys stumbled across the main entrance and destroyed it forever, a tribe of natives known as the Mi'kmaq's lived on the island. They, too, visited it to explore the mysterious light glowing above it from time to time. This also led British military forces to the island as well, leaving dropped relics of war behind for future treasure hunters to become more confused about. Unfortunately for all of the misguided non-technological peoples of the time, what they were seeing was nothing more than what modern people see when they look at a brilliant pinkish-red sky—pollution.

The thrill of the unknown keeps many coming back to the island in search of what does not exist. The treasures of science left behind with the Arc of the Covenant were eventually found in secret by a young man who had access to particular pieces of literature that led him to the island and gave him the knowledge to find another entrance.

This man knew that whatever lay below held great power and would be necessary for his quest for authority and influence.

45 | FDR

Unfortunately for the searchers and most of the world, the fantasy of finding some all-mighty treasure has been a continued fallacy.

In the early 1900s, a young man by the name of Franklin Delano Roosevelt learned from his associates about the forbidden archives at the Vatican. Archives of which held mysterious mysteries and secretive secrets of the ancient world. His thirst for knowledge and power led him to this place, which then led him to what is now known as Oak Island.

Upon his research, he made the connection between the ancient alien treasure and the continuous failed attempts to unearth anything on the island. This information was obtained through various scrolls of documented conversations with some of the last Andromedites—the wingless angels.

Mr. Roosevelt was fascinated by the concept of extraterrestrial life, and the data he had access to, fed his curiosity further, leading him to the restricted ancient texts guarded by the Swiss Guards.

Deep in studies, he found ancient maps of the formerly separated islands drawn from stories of the Andromedites. Stories told by bored and drunk surviving Andromedites. After completing their mission, they lost track of their purpose in life. They slipped into the same habits as the Anunnaki they destroyed. This taught them a valuable lesson that all living creatures eventually rot, whether it be mentally or physically, over time.

The map stuck out to him instantly as he had read various articles about the island during his teen years; it had always struck his curiosity. In the writings, it explained the multiple entrances to the sub-bedrock cavern, including the exiting tunnel, now permanently inaccessible as the password etched in stone to unlock the doorway had been destroyed by a metalsmith. A man who had come across the stone found its heavy size and perfectly smooth surface—except for the etched-in symbols—to be the perfect place to smash his red-hot metal objects. Over time, the marks disappeared as well as the knowledge of them. However, there still existed entrances on the island and a neighboring island.

After learning of this, FDR put together a special team, but only after he first visited the island in 1909 to prospect in secret whether or not these entrances really did exist. It didn't take long for him to locate the main entrance to the underground hiding place of the Arc of The Covenant. This location is situated on the plot of a former slave who owned it after he won his freedom fighting at war. This man was released after serving time and desired land far away from American societies. So, he headed to Canada, purchased a lot on Oak Island, and began growing cabbage to make a living. In one way or another, this man became the wealthiest of all the residents on the island, but no one knew how he did this by selling cabbage.

Some think he found the so-called hidden treasure of Oak Island when in actuality, he had secret relations with a wealthy married woman who, in her death, left him her inheritance. This man had no clue that at the base of a well he dug on his land was the location of an entrance to the underground world.

The Andromedites may have begun their dig between the islands. Still, they needed to enter from other angles to examine the integrity of the islands' foundation from all angles. This was what Mr. Roosevelt discovered. He was only lucky that Mr. Ball, the owner of the former plot, had just so happened to dig a well into the void that the Andromedites used. It was likely due to another depression caused by seismic activity that brought Samuel Ball to the site to inspect it for water.

Franklin returned to the island years later without anyone knowing except a few well-trained marines that were part of the secret society he belonged to. Together, they were able to get to the base of the well to inspect the area. By this time, the well was all dried up. Likely due to the water continuously flooding the 90-foot hole. When they got to the base, an opening that was clearly not of natural origins made itself present.

Before descending into this, they returned to the U.S.A. to retrieve better tools and gear and a few more parties to assist them. They then returned to Oak Island and made their way down the well into the cave system. It was a simple trip due to the methods used to construct the tunnels by the Andromedites. It was not eventful – just tunnels winding down thousands of feet below the surface. All they had was their shadows in the flickering lights of the candles and claustrophobia setting in.

When the team reached the location of the Arc, they immediately knew what it was, and their hearts skipped a beat. None dared to open it as they had all been well-versed in the biblical stories of death. They didn't want to spend any more time in this cave system miles below the ocean than they had to, so four of them each grabbed a corner ring – rings originally meant to have a rod slipped through – and began painfully carrying the box with them back up to the base of the well where it would stay for many years until FDR was able to excavate the land without the knowledge of anyone on the island. Eventually, they gained access to the golden box and brought it back to the U.S.A.

FDR would use this possession to help him gain power with the US government, ultimately making him the president. The Arc of the Covenant was then put under strict supervision by a secret area of government that remains a secret today. Only one civilian was ever given access to the Arc – a Jewish physicist that renounced his German citizenship during World War II.

46 | Manhattan Project

A long time ago, when Yeshua was pinned to an elongated plus sign made of wood, the wounds left his translucent blood dripping into the soil. Then, his resonance seemingly left his body, and three days later, it returned. Abaddon never had any knowledge of Yeshua's resurrection. He only thought the stories to be myths—that is, until the end of the war. Ironically, the two ended up so close in proximity within Germany that it may appear some otherworldly force has been at work. Neither of them knew of the other's whereabouts since the unpleasant murder of Yeshua.

At the time of Franklin D. Roosevelt's presidency, Yeshua had taken up resonance within a Jewish body as he had done since his resurrection. At the same time, Abaddon followed his lust for power, taking him to any human body that would give him such an advantage. Yeshua had become Albert Einstein, while Abaddon was Adolf Hitler. They unknowingly were at war with each other without the knowledge of the other's whereabouts. Something that has been going on ever since the two separated, speeding through time and reconvening.

Being Yeshua's evolved nature to help Humankind – in this century – he played the role of a physicist bringing the necessary knowledge required to excel society to the point of peace—something he would later learn is impossible. Abaddon continued his quest to enslave the human race so his home planet's people can use them as Avatars from afar. The original mission the two were sent to accomplish—a mission that has turned into an eternity of one protecting the humans and the other trying to enslave them.

In August 1939, Yeshua sent the US president a letter informing him—verbatim—that the Nazis are working on creating the atomic bomb, which could destroy anything it touches and give complete power to whoever possesses it. Abaddon only had fragments of knowledge from his past on how it worked as well as Yeshua. The two hadn't practiced their Anunnaki science since they arrived on Earth thousands of years ago.

When Roosevelt read the letter, he instantly understood that what was within the Arc he found on Oak Island was what Einstein was referring to. This led the president to bring Einstein into the secret society allowing him access to the Arc of the Covenant. When Yeshua saw the golden box, the scientists were shocked to watch him know precisely how to operate it safely. He walked up to it and whispered a few words, and the lid floated into the air. The scientists attempted for many years to try and open the box but without success.

When the lid lifted upward, Einstein reached in and removed a small object. The entire team stood in shock, knowing immediately that this man was not of Earth. Yeshua laughed with his mustache curling at the cheek and asked with his German accent, "Now, how in z world did you come bout zis."

FDR explained to Einstein the history he read about the Andromedites and their battle with the Anunnaki from the original Veda kept at the Vatican. It is not Yeshua's practice to divulge his true origins. However, he felt comfortable talking with president Roosevelt considering his knowledge of the history of his kind and his openness to extraterrestrial life. Yeshua knew most humans of this era were incapable of seeing past their own reflections. It was comforting for him to have a conversation with someone versed in truth.

After Einstein opened the Arc and explained to the scientist how to safely handle the reactor, he and FDR accompanied each other for coffee and a pipe smoke. Over their puffing of gray clouds and sipping of black liquid, they discussed the history of the Anunnaki of Earth in great detail. Yeshua explained how he and Abaddon came to Earth to seed it with Avatars made in their image but discovered that intelligent life had already evolved on the planet. This life tampered with their plans, and when they sped through time, they returned to see a failed mission. This brought them on their path to try and fix their mistakes, leading to Abaddon continuously trying to enslave the human race. In contrast, Yeshua tried to achieve universal equality and acceptance.

Yeshua explained to FDR how he had become confused by Abaddon's actions considering neither of them had had contact with the home planet since they left it tens of thousands of years ago. He felt obligated to explain this information to this man due to the substantial growth of the human race and the establishment of various cultures. Cultures that were never supposed to be. Humans were left to grow without direction for too long. This unsupervised evolution of society led to different points of view on beliefs, which in turn caused a problem for people coinciding.

Yeshua's mission, since year zero, has been to unify the people and help create a single self-sustaining race on Earth to prevent what had happened to his race. He has failed continuously, just as Abaddon has been unable to perform mass manipulation. The humans have developed like a spilled cup of water flowing into every nook and cranny, becoming impossible to reassemble.

47 | First Come, Last Dead

After Yeshua—in his Einsteinian form—made contact with President Roosevelt and was ushered into their Illuminati-like society, he began reworking his ancient knowledge of Anunnakian physics.

On his home planet is where the nuclear reactor was built. In fact, he helped build the device that had been buried deep below the split islands. The work brought countless moments of Déjà vu, sensations, and feelings he had long forgotten about. Yeshua began to wonder what other relics from his and Abaddon's mission lay hidden across the globe and worried about the Nazi party obtaining any of them.

It didn't take long for Yeshua to reverse-engineer his workings and then re-engineer them with the technology and materials modern humans had available at the time.

This unification of Einstein and Roosevelt would eventually help bring a swift end to the war. The information Einstein brought to the table also laid a foundation for future scientific discoveries and advancements. The science of the entire technological evolution of the twentieth century was based on this single project.

Prior to the war ending, a man working on rockets for the Nazi party had been secretly plotting to escape, making deals with the United States to secure himself and his team of scientists. These men had access to some of the flight technology used by Yeshua and Abaddon when they first began the construction of the pyramids. They were given pieces of ships found within ancient tombs. The Nazi party scoured the earth for any remaining relics. These relics would provide them with a weaponry advancement over the enemies. Abaddon knew precisely where to send the soldiers to find these artifacts. Something that ultimately backfired on him.

Abaddon playing the role of Hitler at this time, was nearly ready to jump to a new body, so he began doing everything he could to try and tip the scales of war in his favor. Unfortunately, many of his so-called loyal soldiers turned on him, helping the enemies to gain control, putting Abaddon in a no-win situation no matter what he attempted.

Abaddon's body was nearly deteriorated when the first atomic bomb was detonated on Earth since the battle between the Andromedites and Hybrid Anunnaki. It had been millennia since he had a human casing that lasted more than fifty years. The events leading up to the war's end hindered his plans to relocate his resonance. He had to decide quickly on who to take up residence in before the enemy got to him.

He had two plans of which body to take up residence in. (1) his own child or (2) any living body in the Americas with some sort of road to power. His failed attempts would not dissuade him from trying again to destroy the Hebrew descent's bloodline—a bloodline he fears carries the blood of his former colleague Yeshua. This transient nanotechnology linking to Yeshua's hybrid Anunnaki blood allows anyone with the genetics to see Abaddon for what he truly is. During his reign in Germany, a young girl could see his true resonance. He would have had her destroyed, but he became attracted to her and confused about whether killing her off had any purpose.

Shortly after his encounter with this young Jewish girl, the war ended. His plans of genocide were brought to an abrupt end. There were no other options for him then, so he transitioned his resonance into one of the soldier's bodies. A soldier who was sent to capture him. He left Hitler's body as the men invaded his barricade, entered the soldier's body, and then quickly shot himself. He used his new body and weapons to kill his old body. In essence, he killed himself.

Abaddon was penalized when he returned to his commanding officers as the instructions were to—at all costs—keep Hitler alive. The US wanted him alive because they knew he knew where many ancient technological treasures lay hidden. This was of no concern to him, as he simply transitioned his resonance into the commanding officer, leaving the soldier comatose.

Over the years, Abaddon had learned how to body jump without having to start at birth or use the original device built within the pyramids. His tranoquartian blood evolved over the centuries, allowing him to transition at will. This was an unexpected development he wished he could relay to Nibiru.

Without any knowledge of Yeshua's presence in the US or anyone else for that matter, Abaddon began his new mission. He would now need to look at world domination from an alternate point of view and realize that exterminating one race is not the correct way to go about mass manipulation. At this point, the bloodline is so intertwined throughout the globe he'd have to kill everyone to clean up Yeshua's blood.

Regardless of the risk of exposure, if someone claimed to see him for his true resonance, he would just have them committed for insanity or mental derangement. Einstein once quoted his unique interpretation of insanity as "Doing the same thing and expecting different results."—but this is only human nature. Abaddon was the one who told him this long ago, yet Abaddon is the one who has continued to do the same thing.

Abaddon eventually found his resonance in a US official's body and quickly learned which bodies to jump into to gain the quickest access to knowledge. This knowledge ultimately brought him to the stories of Einstein and the Manhattan Project. Without a moment's hesitation or disagreement, he knew that Einstein was, in fact, Yeshua. The news of his long-lost Anunnaki brother was not taken well.

48 | Nuclear Confusion

Over the years, Abaddon collected many international leaders in his pockets and brought them into his ring of secretiveness. He did this by exchanging knowledge for continued trust in case Hitler lost the war. He explained to them that regardless of the outcome, he would be in contact. He said, “Even if I am dead, you will hear from me.” There were unique codes exchanged as insurance that only they would know. This way, when Abaddon reached back out to them while in another’s body, they would know it is indeed him.

Once he found himself in a different position of leadership decades after World War Two, he eventually shared the blueprints of nuclear technology with nearly every country on the planet. This was to provide a way to prevent war, war without his explicit consent. No matter what the situation, nuclear war is a no-win situation. He then began slowly feeding other technologies into the minds of scientists so that computers would advance to the point of modern cellular devices. Once this point in society developed, he then introduced his home planet's nanotechnologies for embedding into the bodies.

The original purpose of creating the humans was to use their bodies as avatars from a distance relieving his underground brothers and sisters from their eternity of suffering.

At the same time, without any knowledge of Abaddon, Yeshua was doing the same thing to help society evolve—secretly implanting knowledge into his colleagues' and students' minds so that they believed their work was original.

Abaddon desperately wanted to find out how the US developed the atomic bomb. So, he took up residence within President Truman’s body just as he was inaugurated. However, Truman never saw President Roosevelt in a private setting. He received no briefing on the development of the atomic bomb or anything related to the issues with Soviet Russia. It wasn’t until years later that he gained access to the blueprints. This left Abaddon responsible for cleaning up the mess he made in Germany.

Abaddon continued his search for the knowledge of the Atomic Bomb and other pieces of technology He, Yeshua, their team of scientists, and the hybrids left behind. Between seeding information into society and locating various ancient artifacts, the two brought America to the most feared county on the planet. As the United States grew into the true superpower of Earth, Abaddon realized that his method of enslavement could only be accomplished through technology.

This realization caused him to develop an ongoing plan, slowly integrating advanced alien technology into the daily lives of the average human. He began by ensuring every American had a television, a phone, and a vehicle. Once society became dependent on these devices, he began integrating computer technology to create an even more significant dependence. Ultimately this led to the creation of cellular technology.

Throughout Abaddon's invisible reign in America, he was multiple presidents and CEOs of tech companies. He influenced Steve Jobs to use the name 'Apple' as an inside joke referring to 'The Fruit of Knowledge.' This entertained Abaddon as the foretold 'Mark of the Beast' is technically the cell phone—in nanotech form. So, the fruit of knowledge brings demise to humans at the beginning and the end. Eventually, he helped develop the 'iPhone Omega.' This device melts into the palm of the user, and the transient nanotechnology becomes one with their DNA. It leaves the Apple logo in the user's palm.

The iPhone Omega was the most anticipated device in the twenty-first century. It would integrate every human on earth and eliminate the need for batteries and cellular towers. Each human body acts as a wireless beacon to transmit data, and the body charges the device. The alien Tranoquarts are not detectable by the primitive human race, and Abaddon knew this. His new plan was to ensure every human on Earth had the iPhone Omega installed. Once the device is one with the blood, a system reboot can occur, leaving the human body wiped like a new hard drive. Then, Abaddon's Anunnaki family can ride the bodies from Nibiru, utilizing them as avatars so they may escape their inner planetary prison.

Abaddon's plans were going smoothly until a strange physicist named James Francis Quasar performed an experiment unraveling the strings of time. Not even the Anunnaki race—as advanced as they are—could comprehend what Dr. Quasar had done. His investigation resonated through time, reaching back to the Helios, where they detected the change and began altering their timeline, but they ran into a problem.

The Helios' had always vibrated with time from start to finish. Oddly to them, at the moment of Dr. Quasar's experiment, they lost touch with themselves and could not connect within a certain stretch of time. This was very upsetting to them as they thought they were the supreme creatures of space and time when a simple human taught them that they are just another spec of intelligence in the universe's dust.

To be continued...